During the week beginning January 27, W. J. Colville is to hold daily independent meetings in Washington, and his admirers will be glad to welcome him after his long stay abroad, and to listen to the new conceptions of truth his guides may have to convey.

The secular press is very kind in its expression towards our work, as it is now in many cities, while the literary productions of the age are giving much of Spiritual lore and information to their readers. The Metropolitan Magazine for January contains a most able and careful article, "Spiritualism and Its Doctrines," from the versatile and truthful pen of F. W. Webber, A. M., that contains a fund of information on our Cause, from which the readers of that popular monthly who have not been familiar with our Cause, can learn much concerning the aims and labors of Spiritualism. This should be noticed by the readers of our Spiritualistic papers, as an instance of courtesy and justice extended to our Cause by the managers of a literary magazine that caters to the intelligence of the public. The article mentioned is profusely illustrated from photos of some of our well known workers and of Spiritual temples. Recently the Boston Journal, once exceedingly marked in its ultra conservatism, has published an extended account of the trance mediumship of a private medium, while other secular papers are constantly doing the same. Truly, Spiritualism has made its way and is doing its work in every quarter.

Our missionary work is extending, and we wish for funds to increase it in all directions, that the good work may grow in this way. We are also seeking to establish a Mediums' Home, under the direct supervision of the National Association, as the enclosed circular will show, and many other plans are in the nature of work for the N. S. A. that should be followed for the good of humanity. We thank you one and all for all kindness and generosity of the past and will be very grateful to you for any aid you can extend in the future. We appreciae your loyalty and goodwill, and reciprocate the same.

We have to report that the N. S. A. is being besieged for missionaries and literature from all quarters, and that we are responding to the calls as well as our funds will permit. This association has had much to do in the line of testing wills that have left money to our Cause, and which have been contested by private individuals. One of these cases, in Indiana, is still pending; we do not know what the result will be, but the N. S. A. has its lawyer employed to defend our rights. Another will case in Kansas has been decided against the will and the Cause of Spiritualism, the Court deciding the man was of unsound mind for having favorably mentioned the N. S. A. in his will. This case has been one of great expense to our Association, but we felt it our duty to defend the will and to seek to secure our rights. It is but another instance of the improbability of Spiritualists securing justice in the courts, or of persons having their wills respected after they have passed on, if they happen to favor Spiritualism. It therefore behooves all Spiritualists to give what they can to the Cause while they are in the mortal and to do their best for the blessing of humanity.

With love and good-will to you all from our Headquarters,

Cordially yours,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

A HOME FOR MEDIUMS.

The National Spiritualists' Association is actively engaged in the good work of preparing a Home for needy and aged mediums, those who have served the angel world and who have become stranded on the shores of time. This work has long been needed in the cause of Spiritualism, and the National Association, in adding it to its other good objects, is carrying out the spirit of true philanthropy.

It is well known that mediums—the genuine, earnest mediums—are prone to become debilitated and feeble as age approaches, owing to the demands made upon their vital forces in the conscientious discharge of their work. It is also well known that very few are enabled to lay up a competency for provision in their old age. One demand after another upon time and purse saps them of their strength, and they are often left homeless and helpless in a cruel world.

The Home, which is to be established as soon as necessary funds are gathered, will be in Reed City, Mich. It is adjoining the sanitarium of Dr. A. E. Spinney, the well-known Spiritualist. The National Spiritualists' Association has already bought and paid for a building there, which will have to be made over and put in shape for a dwelling, with comfortable accommodations for its inmates. At a very low price Dr. Spinney will feed the inmates, and will furnish any sick or ailing ones among them with the best of nursing and medical treatment at his sanitarium. Dr. Spinney has also donated a piece of land adjoining the Home to the National Spiritualists' Association, that we may add to its quarters and accommodations as fast as we can obtain means for doing so. To put the building into proper condition will cost several hundreds of dollars, and the cost of furnishing and maintaining it will be also considerable. At first we hope to enter twelve or eighteen inmates, and when opportunities allow, to increase the number and give homes to many who would otherwise be in misery, destitute, comfortless quarters or be placed in the poor-house.

Knowing that this is a needed and a humanitarian work, and that many Spiritualists will sympathize with it and wish to contribute to it, we feel assured that the necessary means for its maintenance will be forthcoming, and we ask all the friends of the cause and of humanity to send their contributions for this Mediums' Home to the secretary of the National Spiritualists' Association, as we are to create a fund for this especial work. The Home will not be sectional, but it is intended to be a Home indeed to applicants from any part of the country. No worthy case will be denied except for reason of limitation of accommodations. Any society or person who would endow a room and give it a name can do so by paying $50 or more to the fund.

Please, friends, help in this good work. Dimes or dollars will be accepted and appreciated. Help us all you can, and the angels will bless you, the National Spiritualists' Association will be grateful to you, and the worthy souls who are benefited by your bounty will be more than thankful to you all.

All contributions sent to this address will be duly acknowledged by Mary T. Longley, secretary National Spiritualists' Association, 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

Advertisement.

We never accept an advertisement if we have reason to believe it is of a fraudulent nature. Neither do we give any commercial advertisement our personal endorsement, for our personal knowledge in such cases is too limited for that. In one or two cases in the last twelve years, in a large electrotype advertisement (overlooked by us), our personal endorsement was appended without our knowledge or consent. That will not happen again. The advertiser had no business to assume that he was entitled to our personal endorsement. Every advertisement must stand on its own merits, and from the exceedingly few complaints received by us during the time The Progressive Thinker has been running, we do not think that fraud to any great extent has crept into our columns.

IF WE COULD KNOW.

If we could know to-morrow's secrets—see
Just where to-morrow's lights and shades shall be,
If we could pull the curtain back and gaze
Down all the smooth and up the stony ways,
I wonder who would wait complacently?

For you there might be fortune and for me
Gray woes from which I fain would turn and flee—
I wonder who would sing the songs of praise,
If we could know?

Death might be gripping at us there, if we Could draw the curtain! You might bend the knee
In supplicance while I rushed forth to raise
Such wild and joyful shouts as should amaze—
I wonder which would shrink—men's woe or glee,
If we could know?

Progressive women everywhere rejoice in the appointment of William Dudley Foulke as a member of the National Civil Service Commission. No man in the United States is more perfectly fitted for this position. Not only is Mr. Foulke a devoted advocate of civil service reform, but he is a man of great personal integrity, a scholar and broad minded on all questions. He has been always a believer in the full enfranchisement of women, has spoken many times at their conventions and was formerly president of the National Association of Suffragists.—New York Sun.

The problem of evil has been professedly solved in many opposite ways. Every creed presents its own solution. Free-will, predestination, optimism, the fall of man, transitive progress, and several minor theories, are so many methods of explanation. We shall not presume to attempt an account of it. Such a tentative, however ingenious, can at least be but pure hypothesis. Nay, it is demonstrably insolvable without a direct revelation from heaven; and for the obvious reason that the existence of evil is a contingent, not a necessary truth, in the metaphysical sense. It is not based upon any principle of eternal reason, from which it may be reduced and expressed in analytical formulas. It is, on the contrary, a fact of experience, the origin of which can only be comprehended by actual or historical survey. But when, or where, or how it originated, who shall declare? The true question, embodying the whole difficulty, is this—"Why did the Deity purpose to admit it?" or to cause it, if the wording suits you better? And this, beyond all controversy, no one in the universe, not the oldest seraph of knowledge, can possibly tell, unless the Deity see fit to reveal it to the intellect.

For this cause, all metaphysical solutions of the origin of evil must ever continue to be mere hypotheses, and, as such, founded on very meager data. We have not framed such; we have essayed to do better—to demonstrate their insufficiency, and unfold the reasons why they are so. But with this frank admission to back it, the objection, even as to the divine attributes, remains as futile as ever.

We cannot judge the moral character of the Deity from one manifestation of his power alone, unless we are thoroughly familiar with the whole compass of its design. The act reveals the attribute only in connection with the purpose that put forth the act. This is evidently true of even the finite fellow-creature. Suppose that the history of some ancient nation simply informs us that "Zanoni killed Uelika," and informs us nothing more. Can we, therefore, pronounce with unerring, or even probable certainty, that Zanoni must have been a bad man? Assuredly not, unless we know also in addition to the fact, the cause and motive of the killing. Uelika may have been a traitor to his country, and Zanoni put him to death as a minister of the law. The slaying may have been in self-defense, or in open and honorable war; nay, on some glorious field of victory, where the heroic patriot fought for the redemption of his race, and to protect the hearth of his home and the wife and children of his bosom. It may have been, for anything we can allege to the contrary, an act of the loftiest virtue, rather than one of the lowest criminality, or, indeed, of any guilt at all. Thus we reason in relation to our finite fellow-men. Wherefore, then, apply a totally different sort of ratiocination to the ways and purposes of the Infinite Father?

He may have permitted evil as a condition of the greatest good. He may have suffered it in order to the necessary display of that wondrous mercy which could be revealed alone tarough its partial or general prevalence. Nay, he may have ordained it, in order to enhance our everlasting happiness hereafter. The shooting pang of this fleeting moment of life may form the point of comparison by which to reckon the raptures of the whole eternity. In fine, a thousand suppositions may be conceived to avoid the follies of atheism and the sins of blasphemy. Doth the skeptic get rid of evil by denying God? On the contrary, he affirms its endless perpetuity—the utter impossibility of its termination. He does not circumscribe its boundaries—he cures not one pain in the bleeding bosom of humanity; but he extends the grisly terror into all other spheres of existence; since what blind matter, and crude, unconscious force has accomplished here, it must accomplish everywhere and forever!

But the shuddering horror we experience at the bare idea of God's willing evil for its own sake is proof positive of the divine benevolence, which has thus constituted our inner nature to love virtue and abominate vice, even were such vice possible in Deity himself!

Besides, we know innumerable evidences of Infinite goodness around us. In the boundless beauty that ever lives from age to age on the earth below, and in the splendors of the firmament above us, we see and feel it. We behold it in the ecstasies of youthful love, in the serene joys of friendship, in the cherished sympathies and endearing recollections of sweet home. It bubbles up even in the gratification of sense, and mingles with the coarse luxuries of animal instinct. We hear it in the songs of birds and the evening hum of the bee-hive. Never is the light of heaven so enchanting as after a night of cloud and tempest. And even the grave itself is sometimes sought after by philosophy as well as religion, as a not unwelcome bed of repose. It is only the sin that has wrought its own keenest sufferings, which throws such gloomy colors on the features of Nature. The little innocent children, and all true poets, as well as enlightened Christians, and the great mass of mankind, love this same Nature so well that they are very loth to bid her farewell, even for the revealed bliss of life everlasting!

We will notice only one more objection, and speedily bring our argument to a close. It is not an atheistical objection, but one that will doubtless be made by many intelligent and pious Christians to one idea expressed in our conclusion, and demonstrated, as we cannot but deem most fully, in our whole course of reasoning. The idea is the immediate ever-present agency of the Deity, in all the phenomena of Nature. One class of writers on natural theology view the universe of worlds as a grand machine, that was, to be sure, originally put together by the divine hand and set in motion, since which time it continues to run of its own accord, like other mechanical constructions of a similar kind, though under the general superintendence and control of Providence.

Such is the mechanical conception of the universe, as opposed to the dynamic or atheistical. It allows the presence and agency of God: 1. At the period of creation; and, 2. His occasional intervention at the periods of miracles. It allows, too, his general supervision, to keep the machine of Nature from falling into pieces. But it denies altogether that every phenomenal evolution of matter—every motion produced, either in molecules or masses, is the immediate effect of a present volition of the Divine mind.

This conception prevails to a [illegible] erable extent among scientific men, is embraced, perhaps, by at least one-half of the Christian world.

We have no doubt that the almost material, certainly sensual, philosophy of Locke, contributed mainly to this result in the first instance—a result still further strengthened by the strictly mechanical argument, presented with such admirable clearness, in Paley's Natural Theology. The exceedingly eloquent writings of the late lamented Dr. Chalmers also aided the advance of this general tendency.

We are compelled to regard the prevalence of such an opinion as injurious, though not designedly so, to the general interests of religion and science both; while we must feel that it strips Nature of her most highly poetic ornaments, and reduces her most gorgeous works to the condition of mere lifeless contrivances. We have no sympathy whatever for "celestial mechanics." Indeed, it seems to us that the word is a strange misnomer, when applied to the magnificent creations of the Deity, either on the earth or in the sky. To render this evident, let us consider the meaning of the term when used in reference to the works of human art.

In such structures we do not create any new material nor any new force. we simply apply the old to the new purposes, by giving them a new direction. It is a settled law in mechanics, that no arrangement of parts can possibly, under any combination of circumstances, add one particle of power to the original stock of Nature. The screw, the lever, the wheel and axle, always lose in time exactly what they gain in intensity. And thus it is true, beyond all controversy, that the mightiest art of man can neither create a single new atom of matter, or add to the universe one iota of active force. It merely plans special collocations of parts, and adapts them to the action of existing forces. Thus it prepares the water-wheel, and places it in the running stream, where the revolutions are performed by an ever-present power. Thus is human mechanics an arrangement of means, where the human intellect co-operates with the uniform motions perpetually evolved by the Divine volition.

Now, we may be permitted to inquire, In what sense can the Deity be said to fabricate such contrivances? He is the direct Creator, not only of the matter and collocations, but of all the forces whatsoever. He cannot possibly, then, adapt arrangements of means to the action of pre-existing forces, which is the sole meaning of the word mechanics with us. Thus is the conception of a mechanical Deity as false in theory as it is, in our humble opinion, degrading to the proper idea of God, which is that of an infinite free activity, the cause of all conceivable effects which are not the voluntary products of the finite activities created and preserved by him.

The mechanical argument is also defective as a mere piece of reasoning, for—

1. A machine doth unquestionably prove a machine-builder, if it be granted that the given structure be indeed a machine, and that it was actually created. But deny this—deny that a given apparatus ever began to be at all, and until the fact of its beginning be proven, the argument opens an hiatus that no extent of ingenuity can possibly bridge over.

This is the first and radical defect in the reasoning of Paley. It is based on the postulate (not proven, or attempted to be proven, in his treatise) of an actual historical creation. The moment the question comes up—"But what if this earth and yonder heavens be from eternity?" the argument of Paley can furnish no answer, but silently crumbles into pieces. Atheists never were logicians, and they have, therefore, all failed to notice this ruinous flaw in Paley's Treatise. The piercing sagacity of Dr. Chalmers detected its existence, and he essayed to supply the desideratum by considerations deduced from the facts of geology. It might, perhaps, be difficult to say whether he did or did not partially succeed. One response, however, to all his eloquent dissertation renders it utterly impotent to work conviction in a thoroughly logical mind—that if present physical powers can now form the individual organized vegetable or animal, the presumption is strong that past physical powers may primarily have created the genus and the species. To this there can be no answer.

2. But in the second place, an equally fatal defect in the argument of Paley is, that it affords no shadow of even presumptive proof of the present existence of God at all! His favorite example of the watch demonstrates this so clearly that we need refer to no other.

No watch ever constructed by the art of man can possibly furnish the slightest proof of the present existence of its maker. It may continue to keep the record of passing time with the most admirable regularity and precision long after the hand that wrought and arranged its springs and wheels had moldered into dust. He may have ceased to be for a day, a year, a millennium of ages, and it still beat on, ticking its metallic teeth, but telling no news of him who first polished them, nor of the very fingers that wound up its slender chain but yesterday. May it not be so with the world, with all worlds, on the mechanical hypothesis? God may have exhausted his power in the creation, for aught a cold machine may say to the contrary. He may have ceased to exist six thousand years ago; nay, the very moment He rested from his labors, and we be none the more apprised of the fact by the utterance of all the mechanical suns and systems which, as to this point, are dumb as the coarsest clods of inorganic matter.

Nothing can prove present power but present motion, or the unequivocal signs of its present being.

But no such objections hold as to the mathematical and rational argument, of which we have presented the brief outlines in the foregoing pages. It appeals only to the past as witnessed in grand hieroglyphics, seen at the present hour, sculptured on the limestone of the mountains, and engraven in the soft wood of every tree in the forest, and written among the silken corals of all the flowers of the fields.

For the most part, our argument appeals to present motions—the sublime evolutions that are each moment being manifested before our eyes. It points to the past, and proves that a God was. It turns to the present, and demonstrates that He is now. It calls to mind the eternal uniformity of Nature, and infers with indubitable certainty that He will continue to be forever. It leaves no desideratum to be wished for by its friends, and no weakness assailable by its foes. By its application of the doctrine of chances to the mathematical equations which Nature presents in ever-recurring series, this argument renders the creed of atheism impossible without actual insanity.

And, viewed in this radiant light, how wonderfully luminous and beautiful doth the face of the universe become! We behold the Deity enthroned in splendor everywhere, and on all things alike. We see his love-smiles on the petals of flowers and the wings of birds, as well as in the brightness of the sky and deep azure of the ocean. We hear his voice in the octaves of all our music, pealing in the deep bass of our Sabbath organs, out-preaching all our priests, and tolling the bell of thunder, hung in clouds that float higher than the Andes. He weaves the fibers of the oak, he twines the gleaming threads of the rainbow, he vibrates the pendulous seawaves, he calls to prayer from the heart of the storm. But sweeter, oh, sweeter far than all, soft and clear, and without ceasing in our own souls, for ourselves, and those whom we are permitted to love as dearly as ourselves, he whispers infinite hope and life everlasting.

All this follows from the admission of the immediate and universal agency and providence of God throughout all the realms of Nature. Despair can fling no dark shadow on the soul in the presence of that sunshine which gilds all things. There is no room for doubt when faith fills immensity. Atoms and worlds alike become transfigured in the new and cryptic light which beams out, as from beneath a transparent vail, in objects the most insignificant, in scenes the most unpoetic. Even the cold eyes of death ray ineffable effulgence, like stars rising upward to their zenith. Pale fear, appalled at his own shadow, flies over the confines of creation, and leaves all hearts alone with love and joy. We know that we cannot be lost out of the bosom of God; for the root of the soul is in God, and therefore cannot die. The iron chain of necessity releases its coil around the world, and its clanking links of dark circumstance melt away in receding mists, as in the presence of a sun shivered into spangles of glory. The tears of sorrow turn on the faded cheek of the mourner into priceless pearls; and prayer and praise breathe out among blooming roses on white lips quivering with agony. The old familiar faces of the "long, long ago," the loved, the lost, ay, the long lost but never forgotten, are around us once more.

"Their smile in the starlight doth wander by,
Their breath is near in the wind's low sigh"—

In music's divinest tone. The endless ages are crowded into a luminous point. There is no past or future. The faith that asserts God proclaims all things present to the soul. We repose on the bosom of our Father with a confidence nothing can shake. Friends may grow cold and change around us; enemies may band together for our destruction; lovers may fly away and leave us, like sunny birds when the cloud lowers, and the voice of thunder is heard remote. But we have one immortal Friend who stands between us and all foes, encircling our souls in his arms of everlasting love.

For shall not he who preserves, and blesses, and beautifies all things, take good care of all these, his human children, especially created in his own image of power, wisdom, and love? He paints the wings of the little butterfly. He gilds the crimson flower-cups where the tiny insect sips honey-dew at morn. He launches every beam of light. He adds plumes to every wandering zephyr. Every sparrow that falls from its leafy boughs with a chill-pain in its dying heart, falls to sleep on his kindly breast. Never a grain of sand, nor a drop of dew, nor a glimmer of light, has been lost out of his embrace of infinite tenderness since the beginning of time, nor will be while eternity rolls on. Shall he, then, lose me? Can I lose myself?

Then "will I trust him though he slay me." On the summit of this exalted faith, which is certainty, I rest secure. Nothing can move me. The sensuous world has vanished from beneath my feet. I live already in the Spirit Land. The immortal dead are around me. I hear them holding high converse in the translucent clouds. It is no night-vision, although brighter than all dreams. I am become a king, for I am now a son and heir of the universal empire. My throne stands on a pyramid of mathematical principles as old as God himself. I have ascended a demonstration that carries me into the heavens. I have bid adieu to fear. What is there to harm me in the presence of my Almighty Father in a universe of brethren? There can be nothing more to desire. Other want is impossible. I have found God, who owneth all.

Here, then, will I take my repose. The vessel in which I am embarked may drift whithersoever it will on this immeasurable sea of being. It may run riot on the giddy waves; lightning and tempest may rend every sail, and leave its masts bare. Impenetrable storms may hide the lodestar in heaven; the angry spirit of the waters may shriek till the whole world is deaf. What care I? Let the storm howl on—God guides it! And on whatsoever shore the wreck is thrown, he is sure to be there, with all my loves and hopes around him; and wherever he is, there is the open gate of heaven—for there is the everlasting love, which is heaven!

Summer Camp at Waukesha, Wis.

Your many readers will be pleased to learn that through the unremitting efforts of our president of the State Spiritualists' Association, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, the summer camp is to be held at Waukesha, "The Saratoga of the West," next summer. Griffin's Grove, a lovely ideal spot for a camp, within the city limits, so city lights, water, and police, are secured, has been leased for three years, the lease carrying with it a purchase option.

Waukesha is a fine railroad center, and with electric line from Milwaukee, cars coming every half hour, and with our hundreds of Southern guests, what better could have been accomplished for Wisconsin, and all Spiritualists, than to have the summer camp held within our gates.

Hotel and omnibus accommodations will be arranged for by our practical and efficient president in the near future, and the friends who come may be sure of hearty welcome and good care.

This, together with the bringing onto a practical basis the grand idea of a Spiritual College at Whitewater, the Morris Pratt Institute, constitutes a grand sum total of accomplishment that places Mrs. Stewart in the front ranks of radical, persistent, pioneer workers. At least that is the way it strikes the minds of Waukesha and all Wisconsin Spiritualists.

MEDITATION.

When the shadows of the evening,
Fall around us, you and I,
Then we will with full faith believing,
Turn our thoughts up to the sky.

Little dreaming of the morrow,
Or when life shall pass away,
And not thinking of the sorrow,
It may cause this very day.

Let us then be up and ready,
For whatever comes or goes,
Life is strange, but yet unsteady,
God will comfort all our woes.

A DEVOUT ATHEIST STATES HIS VIEWS

An Open Letter to J. Young McFarland.

Dear Sir:—I have read your letter on "The God Question" in The Progressive Thinker of Dec. 28 last, and with your kind permission I will review a part of it, and ask a few questions, and may-hap offer a few suggestions.

To commence: I do not know Brother Loveland personally, and am only acquainted with him through his various articles, but, being both a Spiritualist without a creed and an Atheist, I embrace this opportunity to extend to him, across the continent, the right hand of good fellowship.

As you decline to argue the existence or non-existence of a God, I submit that it was not judicious for you to place yourself on record as believing in one and giving as your reason for this belief that, "The cause that kindled the fires of central suns, swung planets on their orbits, populated worlds with the infinitely varied forms of animal and vegetable life, etc. . . . . must be farther above me than I am above a beetle." And you deduce from this, that though the beetle may not understand you, yet he will not deny your existence and will keep out of your way, if he can.

This is a rather pathetic appeal for the existence of a God, and is somewhat akin to the argument of Catholic theologian Brownson, that because a man doubts, it is evidence of deity; or the argument of Plato that one and one make two, "owing to their participation in duality."

But your argument is both unscientific and unphilosophical. Science has not taken cognizance of any such event, and it is highly problematical if even any Christian theologians ever conceived such an absurdity. If ever there were such a beginning, then there must be an ending, and thus you would disprove immortality. The beetle sees you, and he has sense enough to get out of your way, and if ever I should see this God, before he sees me, I will do likewise. Moses is credited with having seen his "hindmost parts," but I should decline to look on a countenance "that kindled the fires of central suns."

But I will confine most of my questions to a single paragraph of your article, which I now quote: "The N. S. A. is moving slowly and with difficulty in the right direction. It recognizes an Infinite Intelligence; it opens its deliberations with prayer—let us support it. What a power Spiritualism combined with the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth, may yet become! Surely the combination is possible. It would exalt Spiritualism; it would restore to Christianity the day of pentecost."

Let us see. To commence, you are right, dead right, that "the N. S. A. is moving slowly and with difficulty," and The Progressive Thinker pointed out very plainly and truthfully the whys and the wherefores. But you are dead wrong about this pentecostal business. I have been in the ranks for a generation, and this is the first time I have heard it mentioned, except by new-comers from the church, who were not yet out of their swaddling clothes. Our movement has no part or parcel with Christianity, more properly called revamped Paganism. We have our own facts, scientifically demonstrated and these facts dovetail with our beautiful and convincing philosophy.

But what I want to get at is this Jesus business. Is there any evidence, any testimony, worthy of serious consideration, tending to prove that he ever lived. It should be unnecessary for me to tell you that many of the fathers of early Christianity denied his personality. Let me give you one quotation out of many at my command. It is from Faustus, one of the early bishops, and is quoted by the orthodox historian, Dr. Lardner. (Vol 4. p. 20.)

"Do you receive the gospels? Undoubtedly I do. Why, then, you also admit that Christ was born? Not so; for it by no means follows that in believing the gospel I should therefore believe that Christ was born."

If you can get into communication with W. H. Burr, he will give you more authentic information on this subject, in ten minutes, than all the ministers in existence can give you in a century. Mr. Burr's address is Washington, D. C.

But whether Jesus be a myth or otherwise, let us try to find out in what manner his teachings would "exalt Spiritualism."

Have you ever heard his most ardent admirer accuse him of having had an original idea? Was there anything of consequence that he ever said that had not been declared hundreds or even thousands of years before his supposititious advent, by some poet or some philosopher? Did he ever advocate any reform? Did he ever attempt to elevate woman or to free the slave? Did he ever raise his voice against any of the crying evils of his day? If so, when, and where?

Why, I could mention hundreds of benefactors of humanity, whose teachings would benefit our cause—men and women who lived human lives, and were content like Lincoln to do their duty and to remain "of the common people." Lincoln, Phillips, Garrison, John Brown, whose "soul goes marching on," did more good to humanity in one hour, than Jesus did in his whole thirty-three years. They left us the legacy of freedom; Jesus left nothing behind him but "creed."

His teachings, as far as I have been able to discover, if followed literally, would make one a tramp or an inmate of State's prison.

There is one word in our language that is sacred to every one; rich or poor, honest or dishonest; ignorant or learned, white or black. A word that sends a thrill through every vein, and in the twilight of our lives it brings back vivid recollections of tender and loving care, of unremitting watchfulness, mayhap of secretly indulged and self-imposed privations. That word is "MOTHER." It contains a whole library of love, of music, of poetry.

I have carefully read the life of your Jesus and I fail to find that he ever used that sacred and holy name. As he is reported to have said, "Get thee behind me, Satan," so, his invariable answer to his mother was, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" And even when on the cross, as she stood at its foot with clasped hands and tear-stained eyes, the mother-love forcing her to cry out, "My son! my son!" he saluted her with, "Woman, behold thy son; son, behold thy mother," as he nodded to his favorite follower.

Let me remark right here, that the Jesuits, those three accursed destroyers of mental liberty, who plume themselves on following his teachings, and who have named their society after him, base their teachings on his treatment of his mother and have practically decided that woman is without a soul.

Nor is this all. Your great moral teacher died with a lie on his lips. He promised the repentant thief that he would sup with him, that very night in Paradise, and your creed tells us that "he descended into hell, and the third day he rose again."

So you think that Spiritualism needs a creed, and the teachings of Jesus would "exalt" it. I think otherwise. Years ago Charles Fairfield used to tell us whether his neighbor believes in one God, in three gods, in a million gods, or in none?

So, let us be sensible, and let us admit that a belief never can disprove a fact, but that a fact will either prove or disprove a belief. We are all creatures of circumstances and are more or less affected by our environments. So, let us be charitable. Let us remember that what appeals to one, may not appeal to another, and that most of us are still controlled, to a greater or less extent, by our early education.

A few years ago, during a session of the Presbytery, called to revise their creed, an old lady friend of mine remarked, "I understand that they are going to do away with the doctrine of total depravity. My goodness! What shall I do?" This dear old soul could not feel perfectly happy unless assured that she was totally depraved. And so, Brother McFarland, as you are so strongly wedded to Jesus, in order to show my fraternal feeling, I hereby assign over to you, my entire right, title and interest in and to the aforesaid gentleman, and I earnestly hope you may accept this olive branch.

For my part, I cannot conceive of a God or the need for one. My highest conception is that of ascended humanity, so beautifully voiced by our risen brother, Luther Colby, when he depicted a vision given him shortly before his transition:

"Within the holy realm of deepest Thought,
Where Wisdom's precepts are so fully taught,
Resides a band of Oriental seers,
Whose lives are measured by unnumbered years.
Here beauteous flowers of every form and hue
Glisten in brightness with the morning dawe,
Emitting odors of such rare perfume
That keep them ever constantly in bloom.
This is the Land Celestial—this is the Throne
Which wafts its wisdom unto every zone;
This, too, doth guide each planet in its course,
From which the spheres derive their mighty force.
This is the Godhead!—this the realm of law
From which all nature doth its incense draw,
Thus much I know! and knowing, know no more!
And that is why Je-ho-vah I adore."

THOUGHTS ARE THINGS.

And Thoughts Mould Human Character.

This axiomatic, adagic, aphoristic sentence ought to be writ in words of fire on every human brain on earth and in the spheres. I know the difficulty of fixing it and the application of it to our every effort, but until this point is reached we must fall short in our labors, because we shall not see just how to work, nor realize the exact need we are trying to supply. True we do accomplish many things by working lawfully, without knowing why, but we could reach heights that now we do not see the way to, if we only, by this light, could discern the stepping stones.

The great want of the troubled world is knowledge of Nature's ways of doing things. There are those, though, who have made vast discoveries, who have read the hieroglyphs on the broad pages of Universal Effort, and have given to all whom they could reach that which they have found. From these have come this interpretation of their picture reading, and well it behooves us to stop by the way until we ingraft it into all our concepts of being and of doing.

Generalities are surface marks; this fact that "All is Thought," and its concomitant "Thoughts are Things," are to be ingrained.

To the close student these abstract ideas soon find place in the concrete, but those of less analytical and constructive habit leave them as generalities and go on trying to build up character without a most necessary part of its foundation; so the reason of the condition of the human race, as we see it to-day, is that we have not understood the difficulties in the way of right living. Our thoughts are not such as they should be, all good ones. Just as far as they are, so we do well; in so far as we fail, just so far have we been in possession of and using wrong thoughts. The way out of the want, then, is to gather, attract good thought particles until they are in the majority and lead the way.

But what shall we do with the wrong thoughts? The best way I have yet found is not to use them. Giving expression to them keeps them with us, intensifies their power. Repression weakens the bad as it does the good; the sequence is easily reached.

A man asked me the other day how one could rid one's self of the old, hindering, orthodox, creedal dogmas. The best way I could think of is to drop them, let them die for want of use. This, though not always so easy, on account of thought habit, can be accomplished by perseverance. Change your thoughts and you change yourself, because "as a man thinketh, so is he."

Perhaps some enquirer asks, "How can I attract good thoughts?" I answer, "love the good." Love is attraction; it is a wonderful magnet. Another way is to give out the good that is already within, for it is in all, only waiting expression, and also because of the great cosmic law, "give and it shall be given unto thee again, heaped up, pressed down and running over." Try the first recipe and the second will soon come to be part of the living. And when you want to find out something of the possibilities of your future state read that which the medium of Nazareth tried to make plain, as given in the 25th chapter of Matthew, from 34th verse. From this, too, you may discover proof of the fact that "Thoughts are Things."

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

ORIGIN OF LIFE

and How the Spirit Body Grows. By M. Faraday.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Geo. Penman, of California, expresses his high appreciation of the premium books and The Progressive Thinker.

A Philadelphia paper has the following from Pittsburg, Pa.: "Edward Glaub's dream came true. For four nights he had visions of the death by fire of his 5-year-old sister. Last night the scorched body of the little one was brought home from a skating pond. Her older sister had taken the child to the skating surface and placed her near a fire. Her clothes were ignited, and fatal injuries ensued before the blaze was discovered."

We are pleased to learn that Captain Geo. W. Walrond, 306 Opera House, Denver, Colo., the veteran Spiritualistic lecturer and astrologer, is on the road to convalescence and recovery after ten weeks of intense suffering from mental and nervous prostration. He attributes his recovery largely to the help and influence of his spiritual guides and many spirit friends.

Will B. P. Cheney tell where he lives, so we can send him the paper?

Word comes from Indianapolis, Ind., that the members of the Indiana Medical Association are deeply interested in the experiments now in progress in that city under the organization's auspices. Prof. J. Ivan McLaughlin, a well-known hypnotist, is making an effort to demonstrate that through hypnotic suggestion exercised on a mother as a subject an unborn infant may be so influenced that its career may have been shaped out unalterably before its birth. The hypnotist is operating on Mrs. Celia Turner, a young married woman, who will shortly become a mother. Prof. McLaughlin expects to make of the babe a musician. Daily Mrs. Turner is under the influence of hypnosis and, while not in deep slumber, is keenly alive to the hypnotist's suggestions. He makes no effort to do more than inculcate in the mother a deep desire first to have the infant become a great musician, and, second, to inspire her with an absolute faith that the end will be accomplished."

A. W. Keller writes: "The second masquerade ball of the Englewood Spiritual Union took place Wednesday evening, January 29, at Hopkins' hall; a good time and a large attendance. It was enjoyed by everybody. Dr. Emma N. Warne will have charge of the meetings for the month of February. Harry J. Moore is engaged to speak for the society for the months of April, May and June."

G. F. Perkins has removed to Diamond, Alameda county, Cal., where he can be addressed for engagements and readings.

Oscar A. Edgerly, who has been speaking for the Toronto, Canada, Society for January, will continue during February.

A Listener writes: "An excellent program was given at the Fifth Thursday entertainment by the Band of Harmony in their usual place of meeting in Handell Hall Building. The following named persons participated: Mrs. S. J. Ashton, Miss Jennie Francis, Mr. Anthony, Miss Richmond, Mr. Davids, Mrs. Sargeant Richmond and Mr. Ray. There was a select and very appreciative audience present. Those who were not present missed a rare treat. The artists who had kindly consented to assist gave their numbers with true artistic skill. Nearly every one responded to an encore, thus making a wonderful program. One gentleman said Miss Richmond's reading of 'The Rivals' was alone worth double the price of admission. Miss Jennie Francis sang 'The Kingdom Called Home,' with great sweetness and expression. Mr. Anthony is a fine musician and has a very musical voice; he sang well. Mrs. Sargeant Richmond never was in better voice and sang beautifully. People often pay one and two dollars for seats to listen to a program not half as fine as that of last evening. The writer intends to plead for a repetition, and predicts a crowded house. Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond presided and announced the numbers."

Will C. Hodge can be addressed at New York House, San Diego, Cal. He is open for engagements in Southern California, and invites correspondence.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley finished her engagement with Unity Society, Milwaukee, Wis., on Sunday evening, Jan. 27. During the evening she gave the hand of fellowship to three new members, Mrs. Dunlap, Mr. and Mrs. G. F. Brown, formerly of Chicago. Mrs. Cooley's work for the past four months has been very satisfactory, and Unity looks forward to having her with them again next season. She is to be in Peoria for February.

John X. Wilson, of Deadwood, South Dakota, wants the address of Hatfield Pettibone. Will some one please give Mr. Wilson the desired information?

Oscar A. Edgerly will serve the society at Toronto, Canada, during February.

The Chicago American has the following: "Mr. Blaes is a dealer on the Board of Trade and has an office in the Rialto Building. He is a student of occultism and a believer in theosophy. Mrs. Blaes and her daughter are said to have investigated the beliefs of the husband and father. Monday morning Mrs. Blaes suddenly awakened and was seized with the hallucination that the devil was in her room. Her screams aroused her daughter and filled her with terror. Both avow they saw the devil and that he followed them as they rushed from one room to another. They ran from the house, clad only in their diaphanous night garments and rushed through the freezing atmosphere across the corn fields to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Shipman, half a mile distant from the Blaes home."

Mrs. Lole F. Prior, lecturer and message medium, would like to secure camp engagements for August and September, 1902, and wishes to correspond with secretaries of camp associations. Address her at No. 400 Peachtree street, Atlanta, Ga.

Speaking of the employment of hypnotism to prevent a tendency to crime, the Evansville (Ind.) Courier says: "Society will some day arouse to the necessity for lessening crime. It is the heaviest of all our burdens. The item of police protection alone for this one town —$12,000,000 a year, $4 per capita—exceeds all reason, and it is not protection, after all. But while we spend fortunes on punishment we make almost no provision for prevention, albeit as a physical disease, it is prevention that is both easier and cheaper than the cure. The schools do much, but they do not go quite to the root of the matter. Some way must be devised, as it is now in contemplation in Massachusetts, to reach the children before they develop into idlers, drunkards, thieves and outlaws, like the parents who begot them and save them to the state and to themselves. If this can be done by hypnotism, well and good, but if not, let it still be done."

Dr. J. C. Neal writes: "Please say in your paper that one man cannot build a society without help. We have the 'price.' The society at Neoga, Ill., is in need of a phenomenal medium and speaker at once. Address Dr. J. C. Neal, president, Neoga, Ill."

Those who are inclined to cast "sneers" at the medical profession, had better read the following, a special dispatch from Clinton, Iowa, to the Chicago American: "William Strickell can see through the eye of a rabbit that had been inserted in the place of one he had removed. Ten days ago Dr. Paul Walter, to whom Strickell went in an effort to recover his lost sight, put his patient under anesthetics, cut the cornea from the eye of a live Belgian hare, removed a leathery growth which had taken the place of the cornea of the blind man's eye and inserted the rabbit's eye. Today, when the bandages were removed, Strickell said he could see light once more, and though the eye is still inflamed it is possible the patient will soon be able to read. Strickell was injured by an explosion in the Elevada mine, San Diego, Cal. The blast destroyed the sight of one eye and caused a heavy film to grow over the other. He could not see well enough to go about unassisted. The fact that he could see light persuaded the physicians that the retina was still sound, so the operation with the rabbit's eye was performed. The grafted cornea was stitched to the patient's eye with four stitches after the removal of the film."

Clara L. Stewart writes: "While in Sparta the first part of January, and in fact, when Mr. Barrett, Mr. Erwood and myself held meetings there, we rented the W. C. T. U. hall. Some of the ladies objected to its being used for that purpose, and at a session of the Union, the last day of our meeting, one lady got so excited, or wrought up over the affair, that she had a stroke of paralysis, and sank gradually until she passed on in a day or two." Moral: Never oppose a Spiritualist speaker when a hall or meeting-place is desired.

The Chicago American says: "'Ministers going west can go no further than California without drowning in the Pacific Ocean. It would be a grand thing for the church if some of them would drown,' was the statement of the Rev. H. C. Minton in his address before the Presbyterian ministers at their meeting to-day. The statement had reference to the recent utterances of Prof. Charles W. Pearson and brought out a remark from Dr. Herrick Johnson to the effect that he agreed with his brother. Continuing, Dr. Minton said: 'I suppose that Dr. Johnson wishes the Pacific Ocean was nearer to Chicago. The Presbyterian church to-day is more ready to accept without question the Bible as God's word, than ever before."

Mrs. Avery, 141 Gratiot avenue, Detroit, Mich., lecturer and test medium, is open for engagements for society work or for camp-meetings. Write for dates to the above address.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley will be in Peoria during the month of February. She can be engaged for week-night meetings, within a reasonable distance therefrom. Her address is 713 Munson street, Peoria, Ill.

L. C. B. G. writes: "Mrs. C. L. Stewart in a recent flying visit to Waukesha, Wis., set on foot arrangements for a Spiritualists mass-meeting, to be held in that city some time during the month of February. Mrs. Stewart has a host of warm friends and admirers, and a large attendance is expected."

The New York Journal has the following from Toledo, Ohio: "A saloon and Turkish bath-house conducted for many years by the late Patrick O'Callahan have been closed because the new proprietor, William Doyle, can get no employes to stay with him. According to the statements of half a dozen men who have been employed there, the place is haunted, and Doyle himself says there are enough strange things going on about the building to make cold chills creep up and down his back every time he thinks of them. O'Callahan died and Doyle closed the place when A. C. Chute, his bartender, and Thomas Allen, his porter, walked out and refused to work in the building any longer. Doyle, Chute and Allen all occupied rooms in the Turkish bath establishment. Night and day, so all three state, there were mysterious raps on the floor and on the doors. Doors would swing open or shut, electric lights would dash on and then be shut off by unseen hands, and the dumb waiter would rush up and down as if a lively business was being conducted, while as a matter of fact there was none. Electric bells all over the house would ring and the glasses behind the bar would rattle until the three occupants of the place were ready to quit. Doyle called in Thomas Marlow, who keeps a saloon near by, and together they made an investigation."

Mrs. H. Van Over writes from Greenup, Ill.: "We have organized and chartered under the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, and have elected our officers for the year: President, M. M. James; vice-president, A. F. Sulder; treasurer, Charles Conzet; secretary, Mrs. A. Van Over; trustees, Mrs. Lone Conzet, Rev. J. K. Dillon and Mrs. M. J. Starbuck. We have a nice society of twenty-five members. Spiritualism is getting a foothold in Greenup. Any good medium that comes this way will meet with a good reception."

Luella A. Keyes writes from Worcester, Mass.: "The People's Spiritualist Society held its usual Sunday and Monday evening meetings, and Madame Bruce was our speaker. As usual we had a crowded house. We had the largest circle Monday evening that has been held in Worcester, and Mrs. Bruce did a fine work. Mrs. Nettie H. Harding comes very highly recommended to us next Sunday."

Mrs. Lole F. Prior writes from Atlanta, Ga.: "I am back in Atlanta, Ga., once more, my sixth year for the Society of Spiritual Science, and the work here is moving along very nicely. We meet in the best hall in the city, and have decided to separate the philosophy from the phenomena. The meetings are well attended. We recently held a meeting of members at which time Mr. I. Boley was elected president; Mr. A. Dickinson, secretary, and Miss Daisy Dickinson, treasurer, and a very proficient board of trustees. I truly believe we are in better working shape than we have ever been. Our circulating library of liberal and progressive books is doing a great work. To it are subscribers who are in the orthodox churches yet, but by reading they are getting light."

Miss Emma Fenimore of the Tennyson, on the South Side, Chicago, is off for California on a visit of considerable length. She was once a faithful teacher in the public schools of that city, and her friends believe that because of her liberal views she was made a victim to the Catholic domination of those institutions. Her sympathetic geniality, cultured mind, literary ability and active interest in the trend of the new thought have made her friends among Spiritualists and Mental Scientists. A lady friend inveigled her into calling at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Warne, on Evans avenue, the evening of January 28, her birthday, where she was surprised to find old acquaintances gathered in her honor. Sociability, fun, refreshments and psychic demonstrations held the attention of all until the hour of midnight, when God-speeds and formal good-byes fragrant with kind thoughts were spoken to her. The informality of the occasion heightened its enjoyment. It is reported that the mother of the South Side Spiritual Israel, Mrs. Coverdale, the well known medium, was among the giddiest of the giddy then assembled.

Mrs. Catharine McFarlin writes: "I had retired from public service away from home for a time, as I could not bear to leave my husband all alone too long at a time, as our home this winter seems very lonely and desolate since the passing on of our only daughter, and the marriage of our only son on this plane of life. I sometimes think if it were not for the knowledge of their consoling presence I would surely go insane; but with the loving companionship of my oldest son in spirit life, whom many of the readers of The Progressive Thinker have heard manifest himself so beautifully and convincingly through my organism, and now that my daughter is also able to manifest her spirit, feebly as yet, but nevertheless convincingly, it is a great balm to soothe the cut and bruised heart. I now wish to enter again into the work more fully, and therefore announce myself as open for engagements for camp-meeting work for the coming season. My line of work is inspirational and trance speaking, clairvoyant descriptions and psychic readings. I am also a professional entertainer and public reciter. I would be glad to do work the remainder of the winter in localities near Milwaukee, or officiate at funerals and weddings at any distance. Best of references can be furnished. Please address me at 485 Prospect avenue, Milwaukee, Wis."

Julia H. Johnson writes: "I have read A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, and find it the most remarkable book I have ever perused. As you remark, every Spiritualist in the world ought to read it, for there is much to be learned by the perusal of its pages. This is my fourth premium book and the best. The awful scenes it depicts for those who are following dissolute ways, should be enough to change the course of the very vilest of the vile. Its lessons should be a warning to all who are neglectful of a proper preparation for the future life. Merely a belief in spirit manifestation has little bearing upon the real upliftment of the soul from sordid, sensual indulgences, toward the higher, holier phases of life. To lay aside selfishness, which belittles the soul, and all other habits of a degenerating tendency, seems to be the key-note of the book in question. The beautiful scenes it pictures, for those who make it their business while here, to prepare for that future life, are surely most encouraging to all thus engaged. I have commenced a second perusal, as it seems to uplift, and strengthen me in the direction of all which is most worthy and ennobling in life."

Christine Cooper writes from Clinton, Iowa: "The Philosophical Society of Spiritualists has engaged the services of Harrison D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., for Feb. 4, 5, and 6. The society is putting forth every effort in its power to make these meetings the most successful ever held in Clinton. On Feb. 4, the services will be held in Good Templars' hall, Fifth avenue, at 7:30 p. m.; Feb 5 and 6, in G. A. R. hall, corner Sixth avenue and Second street, 7:30 p. m. On Thursday, Feb. 6, the Band of Harmony, auxiliary to the P. S. of S., will hold a public reception in honor of Mr. Barrett, from 4 to 6 p. m. Visitors from outside the city will be gladly welcomed."

Unity writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "I wish to inform the readers of The Progressive Thinker that Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley has just finished her engagement with the Unity Spiritual Society of this city, and has gone to Peoria, Ill., to fill another engagement. Her engagement with the Unity was but for two months, but she so far exceeded the expectations of her friends that she was re-engaged for two months longer, which terminated Sunday evening, the 20th ult. Her pleasant manners and agreeable disposition have won her many friends in this city, and the parting with her for the time being was like the parting of very dear friends. Mrs. Cooley's lectures and readings have been of a high order and most satisfactory to the members of the Unity. She has given as many as forty-five readings (tests) after the lecture, and we know that through her instrumentality there have been many that have been led to turn their thoughts to this beautiful subject, three having been added as members since she has been here. After the lecture Sunday evening a large bunch of Red Beauty roses was presented to her as a token of love and esteem, and her response in a poem through her guide, was indeed beautiful. Our best wishes will ever follow Mrs. Cooley and her faithful guide Mayflower."

Vine H. Hickox writes from Niagara Falls, N. Y.: "The Spiritualists held a meeting on Sunday evening, the 26th of January, in Colt's hall, for the purpose of organizing the First Spiritual Association of Niagara Falls. We hope to make it a success. The city is growing fast; has about 20,000 population at present."

Henrietta Straub writes: "Will you kindly allow me a few remarks about the 'Missing Link of Spiritualism,' which I received in due time, and studied with immense delight. To be sure, the pioneers of Spiritualism do not need the precious volume; they have lived through the beginnings of the grand new dispensation and have grown along with it; but the newcomer, the investigator, the honest seeker after the great truth cannot fail to find within its lucid, simple, matter-of-fact pages the very thing he craves. If a striking test can and must convince the most hard-headed skeptic, the next best thing to it is the reading of accumulated facts, compiled from their very beginning, that bear the unmistakable stamp of truth and sincerity upon them, and are attested throughout by persons of unquestioned veracity, not to speak of the many illustrious names that have endorsed the genuine origin of the phenomena given to the startled world by those never to be forgotten, most worthy instruments of the spirit world, the Fox Sisters. Read the precious volume, honest truthseekers! Make it the corner-stone of your philosophy, and then build on, higher and higher, by studying works of A. J. Davis, Hudson Tuttle, and many other well-known pillars of our glorious philosophy. Build thus a solid foundation while on earth, for a spiritual home that is to last forever." This remarkable book is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price $1.00.

Clara E. Beverlin writes from Sheridan, Indiana.: "Mrs. Josephine Ropp, of Indianapolis, held a series of meetings at Sheridan, Ind., on Jan. 25 and 26, in the presence of attentive and appreciative audiences. She gave convincing and interesting tests; not failing in a single instance."

Hamilton DeGraw writes: "Elder Isaac Anstatt, presiding elder of the West Family, comprising the Shaker community at Shakers, N. Y., had the following dream: Two weeks before the assault on President McKinley, at Buffalo, he dreamed that the President drove up to the front door of the house and alighted. The Elder seeing him coming to the door, went and escorted him in. He looked pale, and seemed quite weary, so that he needed assistance as he was escorted through the house and introduced to the family; and as he was being escorted around, he suddenly, without any warning, disappeared. Now what were the causes which produced that dream? Was it foretelling some calamity that was to befall the president? Is it true, that coming events cast their shadows before, and only those who are in mental and spiritual sympathy with certain phases of thought, can be impressed? Are such facts mere coincidences, or is there a law underlying and causing the production of such apparently mysterious impressions as the foregoing dream? Whatever light can be thrown upon those phases of life will be thankfully received by all who are anxious to arrive to a greater knowledge of the truth concerning this class of phenomena."

E. R. Kidd writes from Canton, Ohio: Referring to the great volume of literature published in the interests of Spiritualism, including many good and useful books offered by the editor of The Progressive Thinker, some of which being practically given away, while many others are offered at very reasonable prices, there is one of which the writer has but recently read, and being exceedingly interesting from beginning to end, it should be in the home of every liberal and progressive mind throughout the land. The work to which he refers is Reading the Vail, a book filled with wonderful accounts of mental and physical phenomena produced at a series of seances held at Spring Hill, Kansas, with William W. Aber as the medium, and which are known as the Aber intellectual seances, all of which are both interesting and enlightening and given by arisen intelligences—excarnate human spirits—orally and in writing, while in a materialized state and in plain view of the ladies and gentlemen who composed the various circles. In addition to the many fully recognized forms, the rapidity with which a number of them wrote their instructive messages or orations, since from 500 to 600 words per minute were written, also the speed with which the spirit portraits were drawn by the spirit artist, are facts worthy of the investigation, study and consideration of the most skeptical."

Henry Lynch writes from Toledo, O.: Mrs. J. A. Murtha, of Baltimore, Md., has just closed her engagement with the Independent Association of Spiritualists for the month of January. Last night our hall was filled with skeptics and other investigators of the cause, and the manner in which she demonstrated to them the truth of spirit return was most remarkable. She has been re-engaged to serve our society for the month of April. She goes from here to Jackson, Mich., where she is engaged for the month of February, and the society sends their best wishes with her, and hopes the people of Jackson will turn out and appreciate her work as well as the Toledo people did. She has the month of March open and would be pleased to correspond with any society desiring her services for that month; also has camp dates open for 1902, as platform test medium. Address during February in care of C. W. McCoy, 105 West Cass street, Jackson, Michigan."

John W. Ring writes: "Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates will be in Texas from Feb. 20, for probably one month. The Galveston (Tex.) Society is beginning to arrange for its annual bazaar, March 29 and 30, and any article contributed will be appreciated. Address Mrs. H. Heyne, northwest corner Thirty-sixth and Avenue H., Galveston, Tex. Mr. M. D. Tenney, of League City, occupied the rostrum of the Spiritualist Society of Galveston, Sunday, Jan. 26, usually occupied by John W. Ring, and pleased the audience with a plain account of his growth from orthodoxy (where he preached for fifty years) to Spiritualism, which he now sees as the oldest religion, in fact the foundation of all spiritual philosophy. Houston is growing in spiritual thought. Mrs. Florence E. B. Shaffer is ministering to the society. San Antonio is enjoying a revival of Spiritualism by the presence of several mediums."

Dr. Geo. B. Warne writes: "Does not scantest of fraternal courtesy suggest that when a medium opens a meeting for his own financial betterment, he should not announce that any of his co-workers 'are expected to be present to give spirit messages and tests' until each one of them shall have authorized him to so advertise him or her? C. Thos. H. Benton, of Rhodes avenue, Chicago, is scattering bills for such a gathering at his own home, upon which twenty-six mediums are listed as co-operating with him. Not only Emma N. Warne, but others of those named are known by me not even to have received a request for such use of their names. Such methods may impress strangers, or people at a distance, but his fellow-workers no not appreciate this unwarranted trading upon their reputation and following of friends which each one of them has."

The Philosophical Journal of San Francisco, Cal., contains the following: "Los Angeles mediums are again in trouble. The city authorities have arrested Dr. and Mrs. Geo. L. Chesbro for practicing mediumship without first obtaining a license from the city for which they would have to pay $5 per month each. These mediums hold certificates or ordination from the state association, and are to all intents and purposes ministers of the gospel of Spiritualism. They are public teachers and exponents of its truths, and should no more be required to pay a city license for the practice of their heavenly gifts than should the priests and ministers of other churches be required to obtain licenses in order to conduct their public or private services. The legality of this question may just as well be tested now as later, and we hope that the matter will be carried to the highest courts in America if necessary, in order to wring from the opposition that justice under the Constitution of the United States which is by right the inheritance of every American citizen. The talk about commercial mediumship is all nonsense. The medium whose powers are delegated from the spirit world, whose endorsements are conveyed by the hands of angels, have just as much right to receive pay for their services in order that they may be enabled to live in this physical world, as priests and ministers of other denominations, who are supported, sometimes in luxury, by the money charged for ceremonials of the church, and if they are compelled to obtain a license in order to practice their powers, then let the priests and ministers be taxed in order that justice exact and impartial, may be done to all. We ask no favors; we require no exemptions; all we want is that which is just and right and applicable to all alike, and this we demand as our inalienable right."

W. P. Clifford writes from Iconium, Iowa: "I am going to try and get up a club of ten or fifteen yearly subscribers. It does seem to me that all Spiritualists should take The Progressive Thinker in order to keep in line with progression. If all Spiritualists would just work to increase the circulation of The Progressive Thinker—in fact all spiritual literature—what amount of good could be accomplished in the next two or three decades; it would be wonderful. I am 61 years old, and have been an investigator of Spiritualism for thirty years. My first installation was in Chicago with such mediums as the Bangs Children then, Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, Harry Bastian, Mrs. DeWolf, that old wheel horse, E. V. Wilson, and others."

Mrs. Eliza J. Snodgrass writes: "I write to express my appreciation of the eight premium books I received some time ago, along with The Progressive Thinker, a much valued weekly contribution to my comfort and happiness. As to the books, I consider myself fortunate in having secured them. I have already read five of them, and I consider them invaluable. I am surprised that any Spiritualist having a knowledge of the existence of these books, could be content without their perusal, and the acquisition of that knowledge so essential to the attainment of truth upon a subject of such vital interest to the human race. These books in themselves are a mine of useful information, and I would advise every Spiritualist in the land not to delay, but to send for them."

Mr. Byron D. Stillman and Prof. Victor Vogel have opened a dancing academy at 52 Dearborn street, suite 301-310. These two gentlemen are well fitted to make a success of their dancing school. They have the assistance of Miss E. F. Wallace.

Mrs. Hattie Smith writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "The Unity Spiritual Society reports that Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley has terminated a very successful engagement of four months. Her work has been very satisfactory, and she carries with her the best wishes of every member and friend of the society and the hope of a return in the near future. Mr. Geo. H. Brooks has been engaged as lecturer for the months of February and March. The present officers of the society are Mrs. Chas. R. Smith, president; Adolph Wagner, vice-president; Chas. V. Schmidt, secretary, and Miss Alvina Schnurstein, treasurer."

OCEAN SUNSET.

Across the ocean's wide expanse,
The evening sunset's golden hue
Bathes with crimson the rippling sea.
Through open doors I seem to see
A wondrous city where rainbows dance
Through a misty veil of radiant blue.

The mountain crests are all aflame,
And a glory glints vale and hill,
The silvery moon like a fairy bark,
Sails thro' a sea of cloudlets dark,
And the starry orbs like diamonds chain
The vaulted sky by a Master's will.

The islets gleam in the distance far,
Athwart the ocean's briny rim
In the harbor nigh, the tall ships lie;
Like tired doves to the home-cot nie,
And a solemn hymn in the twilight dim
Steals softly o'er reef and bar.

The world at rest and the world of toil
Lies bathed in heaven's dreamy calm,
The sad, lone hearts in vision sees
A solace for life's mysteries,
Asleep in Nature's fruitful soil
God's healing balm!

A DRESSING CASE.

Presentation to Mr. Geo. P. Colby.

A number of Mr. Geo. P. Colby's friends met Monday evening, January 13, at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Campbell, Selby street, Nanaimo, B. C., for the purpose of giving a pleasant surprise to that gentleman, it being the anniversary of his birthday. A varied and interesting programme of amusements in which all present participated, occupied the greater part of the evening. Supper was served at a late hour, and in the early hours of the morning the company separated, having thoroughly enjoyed the occasion which brought them together.

During the evening Mr. Colby was presented with a handsome dressing case, and the following address:

To Mr. Geo. P. Colby—Dear Friend:—While we have gathered here for the purpose of honoring the time of your nativity, we regard it as a fitting time also to express to you the gratitude we feel, when we contemplate the many beautiful things which we have received since first we made the acquaintance of yourself and spirit guides.

When we consider how much brightness has been brought to the paths of our lives, through the truths which you have demonstrated to us from time to time, when we remember, many of us that through you we received our first proof of immortality, and held communion with those of our kindred and friends whom we had been taught to believe had gone to some "echoless shore," the pathway to which had never been traversed by angel feet, when we realize that these shores reverberate with glad voices, and the light of the new dawn, sweeping down its pathways, bear us to the angels of our love, then indeed, do we feel, that in our association with you, we have received a light more resplendent than aught which ever shone on land or sea, and it has brought us into a knowledge of the immortality and capabilities of the soul, and the possibilities to which it may attain.

For all the good which we have received through our intercourse with you, and your spirit guides, and particularly your Indian guide, "Seneca," we tender our appreciation, our sympathy and our love. We know that many times during the half century of your life, wherein you have been an apostle between the two worlds, you have encountered bitter opposition and discouragement, but in the face of every difficulty you have steadfastly maintained the truths as revealed to you.

So may the Great Spirit, many years to come, ever give you health and strength to go fearlessly on in your chosen work, that life may be more beautiful to a yet greater number, because of your advent into it—because of the barren wastes along its plane which through that work, may blossom into flowers of knowledge whose beauty and fragrance shall shed around their path the light of unfoldment, which casts out all illusions and fears.

We know not whether ever again we shall meet on an occasion of this kind for life presents many changes, but we shall be with you in spirit wherever you may be, desiring for you and your spirit band of workers, all that shall be a blessing to each, and to those who seek your ministrations, and,

May every moment, every hour
Which speeds from thee away,
But leave the trace of God's own hand,
On each successive day.

We ask your acceptance of this dressing case, not for its value, but as a small token of our friendship and esteem, for mirrored upon our souls is the evidence of things which we have both seen and heard, proving that truth has brushed away the cobwebs which obscured our vision and smoothed many tangled threads in the woof of life.

Truly and sincerely yours,

Members and friends of the Spiritualist Association.

In replying, Mr. Colby said that of himself he was not much of a speech-maker, but he was reminded of his first visit to the Pacific Coast seventeen years ago, and how by spirit intervention, his plans had been changed so that he had been brought again and again to visit places in his line of travel, which he himself had not intended. For forty years he had been working in the interests of Spiritualism, as years were counted he was getting to be an old man, having this day attained his fifty-fourth year, but if he lived to see as many more, while he was able to get about, he would still be in the work. He had found this world such a beautiful place, he was not in a hurry to exchange it for another; to him it appeared more beautiful as the years went by.

Referring to his first visit to the city, he said there was at that time but three avowed Spiritualists in the place, but the interest awakened at the meetings, and through private work had continued to increase, and men and women were thinking and investigating for themselves with satisfactory results.

Mr. Colby spoke very feelingly of his association with the people whom he had met here. If there were any ill-feelings, he had not known it, and he would never have any but pleasant recollections in connection with them.

FREE Asthma Cure.

A New and Positive cure for Asthma has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Asthma. The cures wrought by it are really marvelous. Among others, Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Va., was cured of Asthma of thirty year's standing, and Mr. Alfred Lewis, the editor of the Farmer's Magazine, of Washington, D. C., testifies that after eight years' continuous suffering, especially in Hay-fever season, the Kola Plant completely cured him. He was so bad that he could not lie down, night or day, for fear of choking. After eighteen years' suffering from the worst form of Asthma, Mrs. Maggie Ross, 814 Madison Ave., Indianapolis, Ind., writes that the Kola Plant completely cured her. Rev. S. H. Eisenberg, Centre Hall, Pa.; Rev. John L. Moore, Alice, S. C.; Mr. Frank C. Newall, of the Market National Bank, Boston, and many others, give similar testimony of their cure of Asthma, after five to twenty years' suffering, by this wonderful new remedy. If you suffer from Asthma in any form, in order to prove the power of this new botanic discovery, we will send you one Large Case by Mail entirely free. All that we request in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you absolutely nothing. THE PSYCHOGRAPH

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I and communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

ANGELL

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Geo. W. James: Q. Will you give an explanation of conscience, sub-consciousness and spiritual conscience, for the reason that many make use of the word subconscious, and few know what it means?

A. There surely is a great necessity to have exact definitions of words and terms, when they are used so loosely as they are by many who pretend to exactitude. There is only one conscience, as there is but one reasoning power in the mind. There cannot be a spiritual conscience any more than there can be a spiritual reason. The mind is a unit, and conscience is not the manifestation of any one faculty but a product of all. It is the highest form of reason, which comes to its conclusions of what is right and what is wrong; what ought to be done and what not done, not by ascending slowly from cause to effect, but but by the swift decision of intuition.

By self-consciousness, this correspondent evidently means the much-talked-of theory of the sub-conscious self, which has been at several times discussed in this department. The individual is a unit, and there is no sub-conscious self, possessing the powers the theorists endow it with. It is entirely of the fancy. There is no sub-conscious self with faculties superior to the normal self.

For a more extended discussion of this subject, reference must be given to preceding numbers of The Progressive Thinker. When first published, this theory with its scientific verbiage, startled many a Spiritualist, for it was claimed that it explained all spiritual phenomena. Really it explains not a single one.

E. H.: Q. Is the monogamic relations of the sexes founded in natural law? and is chastity in the marriage relation imperative?

A. The fact that the number of males and females are about equal, the number of male children slightly exceeding that of females, is absolute evidence that man is monogamic by the constitution of his physical and spiritual being. The glory of the present civilization is the home, with one father, one mother. The home is the initial factor of the state. Marriage is contracted and hedged in by law, and contemplates the family. Children are third parties to this contract, having no voice, but with rights carefully guarded by law, and many rights not defined by legal enactment, but well understood. Children have the right to be well born, by which I mean, a healthy body and a vigorous mind; they have a right to demand of their parents care, attention and preparation for life. If parents cannot give them this, or shrink from the burden, they should not have the children. For there is no crime against humanity greater than to bring an immortal being into existence, incapable, and unequipped for its responsibilities. The old religious idea that God gave as many children as he saw fit, has been the cause of immeasurable suffering and is a doctrine made damnable by its excuse for unbridled passion.

Monogamic marriage was preceded by polygamy and concubinage, and the ethics of the latter yet linger. There are yet two codes of morals, one for women, one for men. Woman would hold strictly to the monogamic promise of marriage, man too often, is tainted with a tendency to polygamy. And strange to say, society upholds him, while it tramples in the dust the woman found derelict to her vows. More strange, the upholding and perpetuating force of this dual morality is woman.

Cæsar's wife must be above suspicion, her chastity without blot or blemish, but Cæsar may be the most despicable debauchee, and "good society" receives him unquestioningly. Mothers welcome the degenerate roue to the presence of their daughters, who take no offense at their moral putridity; take them for husbands, with the expectation that after marriage they will receive the undivided attention which they expect to yield. How soon they find it all a dream! A horrible dream! And why? Because woman does not hold man to the same ethical code that he demands of her!

The air is burdened with the moans of blighted love, and broken hearts, because woman expected perhaps not an angel, but honor and decency in her husband, and found a brute. And yet this must be until she declares for herself this self-evident right to have the same purity, devotion, and exclusiveness she so willingly gives; demands one moral code for man and woman.

A delicate subject for a newspaper! Aye, most delicate but lying at the basis of spiritual advancement. Spiritual strength is gained and maintained only along the path of chastity and self-control. The glory and perfection of the coming generations lie in the same direction. Prisons, penitentiaries, houses of correction, houses without name, charity and insane asylums, retreats for the imbecile, deformed and incapable, are filled by those "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity."

Even more than in woman, the excellence, strength and productive power of man depends on and is the direct outgrowth of a pure, chaste, and virtuous life, wherein all lower desires, instincts and passions are controlled by the high spiritual faculties. There is passion, and there is love; almost always confounded. Passion is utterly selfish, feeds on and destroys.

Love is absolutely unselfish; always gives and asking nothing, like the sun in heaven.

Anna Howard Barton: Q. Will the sectarian Spiritualists and the radical bring a division among Spiritualists?

There need be no fear of this result. The sectarian element in Spiritualism will ultimately be absorbed into the churches. Radical Spiritualism, have the truth, which is always radical, only has inherent vital force.

The passage wanted by this correspondent is not in the Bible, and hence it is not surprising that she could not find it.

S. D. M., Mich.: Q. Having formed a circle of eleven members, we held a seance last Sunday evening. In less than twenty minutes there were three under control, and one who could scarcely resist. The first went into a trance and personated the death of one of our neighbors killed in a railroad collision; the second was held in trance for an hour and finally did some talking under control; the third talked in the Indian language. We had raps and independent voices also. What we desire to know is, if it will be dangerous for the mediums to go on?

A. There is not the least danger, if the seances are not held too often, once a week, and under no circumstances more than twice, with appointed time and place, and the time fixed to an hour or an hour and a half at most. When the medium is overtasked and vitally depleted, and the circle exhausted, other and undesirable influences may usurp control, and it is found that once having thus gained a position, such are difficult to shake off.

A. Millsap: Q. Why was Bruno burned and when?

A. Guiordano Bruno was burned at the stake at Rome, Feb. 17, 1600, for heresy. His heresy was the publication of what may be called modern thoughts in opposition to the theological views of his time. As he would not retract, the church in its anger at every one who doubted or dared oppose, sentenced him to this horrible torture and death. He was one of the few martyrs whose martyrdom came from their adhesion to science. Religious faiths of all shades and varieties count their legions of martyrs who died rather than renounce their creeds, and the more incomprehensible their creeds, and impossible to prove, the more ardent has been the spirit of such devotees. But science has furnished only a few, of whom Hypatia in olden times, and Bruno in modern, are the most conspicuous examples.

To the Spiritualists of Wisconsin.

We have now but little over two months left of the fiscal year, and we have much work that must be done before the next convention, if we will open that year with as good prospects as we did the last year. I have been busy in various ways, in the interest of the association, and have succeeded in accomplishing what will be of interest to the association, but have not been out in the field as much as I would like to have been.

Now, if you will interest yourselves in the work and assist me, we will work with a will, and be able to start the new year with all indebtedness paid, and ready for better work next year. I will go to any place where the friends will meet the expenses, and assist in making the meetings a success. Let me hear from you, and help me make these two months show a good report.

I ask you, Spiritualists, to do this for the sake of the cause we all claim to love, and are willing to work for. Will you do it? Will you do more? We have a debt over us, contracted in the last camp-meeting. I have begged the Spiritualists who voted that camp-meeting on the officers of the association, to help us lift it. We did all in our power to make it a success, and in everything but finances it was more than successful. Many who never knew the truths of our beautiful philosophy, were made conscious of the return of spirits, and immortality, and the work done at Wonewoc Camp will be lasting. But the season was short, and expenses high, and rain the last part of the session added to the difficulties, so that we were not able to meet the expenses. Our secretary, Mrs. Baker, has called the attention of the Spiritualists to this, and asked you to contribute to its payment. So far little attention has been paid to our calls. Now if every Spiritualist will send either to Mrs. Baker, Portage, Wis., or to me, Whitewater, Wis., one dollar, or even less if you can not give that much, we will be able to pay off our debts and commence the year clear. Will you do this? And will you help me as your president, to carry out the work I am expected to do, by co-operation?

Hoping to hear from every town in the state, I remain, yours for Spiritualism, CLARA L. STEWART.

IOWA STATE ASSOCIATION

Annual Meeting and Address of the Secretary.

To the Editor:—The first annual meeting of the S. S. A. of Iowa has just been held at Oskaloosa. The attendance was very good and much enthusiasm displayed. Our speakers and mediums entertained large audiences each evening. Mrs. Westlake and Mrs. McCoy were at their best, while Mr. Barrett's wonderful inspiration was poured forth to hungry souls who listened with marked attention. The following by-law was adopted: Mediums who are fully endorsed by the State Spiritualist's Association of Iowa shall, upon application, be provided with credentials from said association, bearing the signatures of the secretary and president, with the seal of the association affixed.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Dr. G. A. Hinton, Oskaloosa; vice-president, John D. Vail, Marshalltown; secretary, Stella A. Fisk, Keokuk; treasurer, W. T. Hamilton, Wellman. Trustees, Nellie Enoch, Terry; Dan Davis, Oskaloosa; G. H. Richardson, Belmond; E. H. Vandenburg, Clear Lake; W. J. Hicks, Ottumwa.

Four delegates with alternates, were elected to the next N. S. A. convention.

The next annual meeting will be held at Ottumwa, Jan 17-20, 1903.

It is most earnestly requested that in all localities throughout the state where missionaries are desired, a request for them will either be sent to the secretary or president.

H. D. Barrett, President N. S. A., will spend about five or six weeks in Iowa, and will give the work much needed help. He will be at Keokuk, February 1-3. It costs very little to have him give his most interesting lectures and each circle or society should make a slight effort and give him a call. People always think better of Spiritualism after having heard him.

STELLA A. FISK, Sec.

Keokuk, Iowa.

ADDRESS OF STELLA A FISK.

Mr. President and Fellow-workers:—It is less than a year since our organization, and in looking over the work of that time we must view it with a goodly degree of satisfaction. We feel that a substantial foundation for future achievements has been laid. This large attendance at this our first annual meeting shows that much interest has been awakened throughout the state. We know that without union there is little strength. We as Spiritualists have reached that degree of development where we recognize the fact that co-operation must be adopted if we would progress farther intellectually, spiritually and physically. I say physically advisedly, for the physical body must be made a fit place for the "indwelling of the holy spirit," else spiritual and mental growth is practically impossible. Then to this end we must join our forces and make common cause against ignorance which is the true parent of all evil.

Through the efforts of our honored missionaries and the thoughtful care of our president, four societies have been organized and chartered. The first one, at Council Bluffs, was organized by Isa Wilson Kayner, E. V. Wilson's gifted daughter, who wrote asking if she would be permitted to organize a society at that place and such other information as we could give. We immediately replied that we should be grateful for such timely aid, and in a few days received the application for charter. Therefore Mrs. Kayner has the honor as well as our thanks for instituting the first local society chartered by the state association.

June 27, there was a meeting of the executive board at Marshalltown where the Central Association were holding their camp meeting. Through their courtesy time was allowed to the state association which was well occupied and considerable funds raised, as was shown by my financial report, also a number of personal members gained. At this meeting ordination papers were issued to H. C. Holsclaw and Mrs. Eva McCoy, and plans for future effort along the lines of propaganda work were laid. Vice-president Vail and your secretary were elected delegates to the N. S. A. convention at Washington. Mr. Ed Weller and Mrs. Nellie Enoch alternates. As we were about leaving home for the convention a letter from President Hinton informed us that Mr. Vail would not attend. We immediately wrote to Mr. Weller, his alternate, to see if he could go, but received no reply. At Washington, on the first day of convention we were delighted to see Mr. W. T. Hamilton in attendance, and he was duly seated to fill Mr. Vail's place. Let me say just here that a finer, more intelligent-looking body of people it has not been my fortune to see in my life, than I saw at the National Spiritualists Convention, last October. I am proud of it. I am proud that I am one of them—a Spiritualist.

We learned a good many things at this convention that I wish you might all know. I am going to tell you some of my conclusions, and some events that have led me to them. While listening attentively to the report of the committee on credentials, we found that in many of the eastern states not only the state associations, but the local societies as well, were chartered by the N. S. A. Thus a state with a dozen local societies counting at least one delegate for each and two for the state, could have fourteen delegates, while in all the western states only the state associations (and perhaps a very few camp-meeting associations) were chartered and could send delegates. So no matter how large the membership, nor how many local societies the western states had they could only have one delegate for their charter and one for each one hundred members or major fraction thereof (this was changed to fifty during the convention, while in the east one hundred persons might compose fourteen societies with seven members each and send fourteen delegates, then the same one hundred people might form a state association and send two delegates. Therefore we conclude that the representation is unequal. We feel sure that we have the numbers west of Buffalo and Pittsburg to equal if not exceed those east of those points.

I feel like Uncle Jesse Harper (one of Abraham Lincoln's old-time friends) did on the political situation. He said the cow had been standing with her head to the west for a long time, feeding on our fertile pastures and green fields, while the eastern people had been milking her, and he wanted to turn the cow around. I want to turn the cow around in this case, for a little while anyhow.

There was a meeting of state officers held in a committee room with the purpose of forming a closer relationship between the state associations, thus to support each other in our work and to seek some method by which all, east and west, north and south, have equal representation based upon actual membership without reference to the part of the country from which the most money comes by subscription or donation. Of the New York State Association, was made chairman, and myself secretary. Several sessions were held and much talk indulged, with the result that we became better acquainted with each other's ideas and I believe are on a better working basis. We adjourned with the understanding that we should meet again next year. We do not ask for the west more than our due. We ask for justice.

There are grand people in the N. S. A. It is a grand organization and we believe in standing by it, first and last and all the time. True it is, that one year ago last October at Cleveland, it was understood by the western delegates that if we would vote the convention at Washington for 1901, the east would vote for Milwaukee for 1902. But when the time came, such a strong opposition to Milwaukee was made by the east that Sister Stewart felt it to be best to withdraw their invitation to that city, and hence next autumn we meet in Boston—the city where even the beans are baked esthetically.

If there are mistakes in the N. S. A., let you and I help to remedy them. It is a goodly ship. The hull is sound. The decks are clean. If there is anything wrong with the rigging, let us like good sailors make it right. There is no law made by human beings that can not be changed, no constitution that cannot be altered if it is only gone about in the right way. I have been asked what my plan is. It is simply this: Give each delegate to the N. S. A. as many votes as he or she represents members and if there be more than one delegate from a society divide the number of votes between them. Then if a western state goes to the N. S. A. convention they can vote according to the number of Spiritualists in their state who are accredited members of some regularly chartered society. While the eastern states would be just exactly as well off, for each delegate could vote the full number of their membership on the same basis. They could have more or fewer delegates than we, it would make no difference, as the number of votes cast would only equal the number of actual members in good standing and for whom the proper per capita tax had been paid. No member to be counted twice. If a person belonged to one society and had representation there they could not have representation in another. Just for an instant this might seem complicated. But think it over and you will see that it could be carried out with little trouble if accuracy was observed.

Now it is for you to say what stand Iowa shall take. It is for you to instruct your delegates this year as to what position they shall take on this question next October at Boston. For the matter will come up. It is like Banquo's ghost, it will not down. Therefore in the interest of justice and right we must express ourselves. We want no division in the N. S. A. We want union. We maintained political union in the early sixties, and how much stronger is our nation for it. The same law of justice will apply at the present time. It will not do to abandon the state associations as some have proposed in attempting to solve the question. They are very necessary to the work. They know the conditions in their own states. They understand the peculiarities of their own people and are so near them, and of them, that they can carry forward the work to better advantage than the National, whose headquarters must necessarily be located far from many of the states. The utmost confidence and close relation should exist between the National and the State, likewise between the state and the local society. The union must be cemented on the broad basis of justice to all and privileges to none.

I see an electric carriage—automobile, if you please—with a sturdy youth directing its course. His cheeks are rosy with health, his eyes beam with joy and earnestness, his brow betokens intellectual and spiritual attainments, while love, good will and keen determination are depicted on every line of the entire countenance. He is whirled along by this unseen force which he is holding well in hand, directing and controlling it all. On the wheel I see a fly. At each revolution there is danger of its being crushed among the cobble stones and dust of the highway. And shortly the fly meets dissolution and is left as a part of the debris of the road, while the strong, handsome carriage rolls on, carrying the smiling youth through green pastures and shady groves, past rose bowers and fruit-laden orchards, to a beautiful city, his place of abode. I can but liken this wondrous carriage to the golden chariot of progress which is ever sweeping on through the paths of knowledge, and on, and on, to the beautiful city of light where we shall "know as we are known." The question for us to answer is, shall we unite our forces and be the energetic youth, the personification of truth and love that drives the car of progress, or shall we, the Spiritualists of the world, be the fly that is ground to powder under the wheel?

I need not pause for an answer, I can read it in every face. Then be up and doing, for this is an age when every sluggard is left in the race. We must join hands east and west, north and south and use our best efforts to be above reproach, exercising the broadest love and charity to each other and to all mankind. In order that this great whole may be perfect we must make its integral parts perfect. Individually we must ever stand for the right. No good true Spiritualist can lead a double life. He must be what he or she seems to be. We claim that Spiritualism embraces everything that affects the human spirit. We say there is much in this movement for the world, for all humanity; then we must show to the world a clean balance sheet for our lives, else they will justly cry out "Hypocrite!" We must enter into the secret sanctuary of our souls and cleanse them so thoroughly that no tendency to evil remains. We must live white lives, forgetting all else but right living. We must teach by precept what our lips utter loudly in public places. No pariah will ever be able to lead humanity on up the steep hill of progression. Those who are possessed by greed and avarice, by the various vices mankind are subject to, for instance, tobacco and whiskey, and their attendant evils, should never be put forward as representatives of a grand and noble movement in behalf of truth and to elevate those in darkness.

It is not always men who have bad habits. I was once, some years ago, invited to a seance. I had never seen the medium, therefore I went. It was a woman, and she, a medium, was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. A medium, who of all people should live a pure life. She gave messages to each one present, with the exception of myself; some were recognized. I got none, thankful that my good honored mother did not communicate through such a channel. I was thankful to the good angels that they kept my little girl and boy from approaching such a walking liquor bottle. A clean life, a clean body for the spirit to dwell in, should be the first essential. If you "know not the way, or knowing walk not therein" how will you lead others? Let those who are not living clean lives secretly as well as selves before attempting to show others the way. Let us not stop the cry for purity everywhere, neither for fear nor favor. Let us "hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may." If you build not on the solid rock of truth and right living your structure will be swept away. We as an organization are young in Iowa and we must see that our growth is healthy. We must let no disease creep in. Let us make a clean record before the world, so when people look upon us with critical eyes they may say "these Spiritualists have a belief that causes them to do right, to live right, to be honest. We will investigate."

We, the Spiritualists of Iowa, have the power to move the world if we will make truth the fulcrum upon which we rest our lever and then apply our force in unison. I have lived in Iowa almost twenty-two years, and I am proud of our state, proud of her fertile soil, proud of her statesman, proud of her brainy men and women, and proud of her Spiritualists. We must, nay, we shall, take our place beside all other states as their peers, bound to them by love and good fellowship to work in the great cause of making the world a better place for our sons and our daughters to develop their various gifts and powers so that they may ultimately fulfill the great purpose of existence, for "it is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die."

Did it ever occur to you that a wonderful help is given to every one who is made to understand that instead of putting his sins and evil doings on the shoulders of Jesus of Nazareth, he must just carry them until he has atoned for them himself? It gives him a strength of character both spiritually and mentally that the believer in the vicarious atonement can never have. The clinging vine can never stand upright as the sturdy oak does. Self reliance is the direct attribute of the active Spiritualist.

Then depending upon our own effort, with the mighty power of truth and purity to direct us, let us carry the light to every corner of Iowa. Let us lay aside personal wishes. Let us willingly surrender our own individual desires for the benefit of our fellowmen. Let us be lifted up by the grand thought that our angel loved ones can come to us and help us upward and onward, casting aside all personal grievances and uniting in the broad commonwealth of brotherly love, joyfully accepting that which will bring the greatest good to the greatest number, ever asking within our own hearts:

"What shall I do to be just?
What shall I do for the gain
Of the world—for its sadness?
Teach me, O seers that I trust!
Chart me the difficult main
Leading me out of my sorrow and madness,
Preach me the purging of pain.
Shall I wrench from my finger the ring
To cast to the tramp at my door?
Shall I tear off each luminous thing,
To drop in the hand of the poor?
What shall I do to be just?
Teach me, O ye in the light!
Whom the poor and the rich alike trust:
My heart is aflame to be right."

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mrs. Letitia Meacham, wife of Lafayette Meacham, of this city, passed to the higher life, Jan. 18, 1902. Mrs. Meacham was born in Indiana, in 1831, and came to the San Bernadino Valley in 1853. She and her husband were charter members of the San Bernardino Society of Spiritualists, which is the oldest incorporated Spiritualist Society in the State. She leaves a husband and six sons, with their families. She was buried under the auspices of the Pioneer Society of this county, the undersigned officiating at her funeral which took place at her late residence on the 20th of January. It was largely attended.

ELLA WILSON MARCHANT.
San Bernardino, Cal.

Mrs. Sarah E., wife of A. G. Wilkins, passed to spirit life, Jan. 23, at the home, 1182 Park avenue, Meadville, Pa., after an illness of nearly three months. June 9, 1857, she was married to Mr. Wilkins, at Cooperstown, where they resided for about 20 years. During about 25 years their home had been in this city, excepting brief absences in Florida and Ohio.

The deceased was a lady whom to know was to love. Her qualities rendered acquaintance with her a source of pleasure, and her death will cause profound regret to many friends, whose sympathy is freely extended to the bereaved husband and son and other relatives. The funeral was the following Sunday at 2:30 p. m., at the residence.

Passed to her home in spirit life, Rosa, wife of John Gregar, of Elgin, Minnesota, at the age of fifty-five years. Mrs. Gregar was the mother of twelve children, eight of whom survive her, six sons and two daughters. She was a truly unfolded Spiritualist, as her life was an example of nobility and purity, patience and charity. She was beloved by all who knew her for these sterling qualities of character. The funeral was held in their spacious home, which was taxed to its utmost, and people of all religious phases were there to listen to the message of death as taught by our beautiful and comforting philosophy. The writer officiated, and was given very pleasant conditions.

CATHARINE M'FARLAND.

Passed to spirit life, at Port Angeles, Wash., Mrs. Laura E. Peters, 61 years of age. She was a prominent Spiritualist. While never known to have a personal ill-will toward any one, she was radical, aggressive and progressive, strong and positive in her convictions, and plain mannered to an unusual degree. She had no time for dress or the vagaries of fashion. She carried this to the end and would have only the most simple burial. Her coffin was built by a friend and the hearse was a neighbor's spring wagon. As the days shortened and her time was setting, friends would come with sorrowful faces, but she would have none of it. She wanted everyone to feel glad, for "Am I not about to step off into a higher and better life?" she asked, and as the minister fittingly closed her discourse, "Mrs. Peters had only bid 'good evening' to her earthly friends and 'good morning' to the spiritual." The funeral ceremonies were conducted by Esther Gideon Thomas, Spiritualist minister, of Seattle. COR.

January 16, Mrs. Georgia Cook Bartholomew passed to spirit life, at her home in Irvington, Ind., aged 54 years. She had been an active member of the Spiritualist Church of Indianapolis, Ind., for several years and for nine years a member of the Ladies' Aid of that church. She was the first one to be called by death from the Aid in all the years of its work. Her funeral was from the Spiritualist Church. Lucetta L. Curtis gave the address, and Mrs. Amanda Coffman offered the invo-

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, and All Being

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.

"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-effacing, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances, Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others covering law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. "THE UNKNOWN"

-BY-

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. THE EVERLASTING GOSPEL.

Is Its Testimony Being Made Manifest to the World?

The answer to the foregoing question must be given by each individual soul as far as their own personality is concerned; they alone knowing better than any other mortal whether that power has made itself manifest in their individual life. In the great aggregates of units of life which by their combination constitute the governmental systems of the world, is that spiritual power making itself felt at the present time in a more forcible manner than in any of its former manifestations? In spite of all opposing arguments which seek to uphold the doctrine of human degeneracy, the answer, if given according to the actual presentation of the facts of the case as they reveal the condition of human society in all of its varied phases, must be that when compared with its former history there never was a time when those higher spiritual forces were dominating human life to the extent that they are at the present time.

The cry that is going up from the thousands of hungering and thirsting souls who are asking for the bread and waters of life has made its impression on the thought of the age, it realizing that something is needed besides the stone that has been in the form of theological dogmas and theories regarding human life and its destiny, and which have through spiritual revelation and scientific investigation been proven false, and which has caused a reaction; the mass of intelligent thinkers who were formerly under the sway of those erroneous conceptions of what constituted the obligations of each individual life to itself and its fellow beings have evolved more consistent ideas regarding that subject. The forces of the spiritual world are making its influence manifest to human life as a power superior to any that he was capable of realizing when dominated by those false theories, and as they are being outgrown, the soul turns away from them with a feeling of nausea, and which has because of this evolution of spiritual thought caused the supporters of those false theories to attribute it to moral degeneracy, when through their own blindness they have been unable to discern the signs of the times, the prophesy of which has been given by those instrumentalities which have developed as mediums of the higher law and through which the truth concerning it has been revealed to the world.

There are none so blind as those who will not see, and if there are any who cannot discern the handwriting on the wall announcing the doom of those theories which presented the doctrine of saving grace if the penitent would only believe that through the martyrdom of a good man they were absolved from all responsibility as far as their life acts are concerned, and through that vicarious atonement they had become heirs of salvation, not being conscious of the immutability of that law which says that "whatsoever ye sow, that shall ye also reap." But such who are not capable of understanding that higher law are more to be pitied than censured. The old beliefs are unable to accomplish the work of regeneration and redemption of those who are groping in through the influence of those false doctrines, but in spite of them.

The testimony of the Everlasting Gospel, its power and influence with those who are yearning for the light and a more perfect knowledge of the truth, does not depend upon the material prosperity of any religious sect or political party, and as a rule which seldom varies, that success is the cause of the closing of the gates which were formerly standing ajar, it has broken the medium of communication through which was transmitted the spirit and life of that testimony. It has been the universal experience of individuals and nations that it was when they were passing through the valley of the shadow, were giving terrific battle to the malignant forces that were seeking their overthrow that they were able to draw the nearest to and receive the more perfect ministration from the spiritual world; they being more conscious at such times of the fact that they were dependent upon those angel ministrations for help to successfully remove the obstacles that impede their journey. There has been in the past, and there is at present, and without any doubt to the contrary there always will be those individual souls who are in the world but not of it, who do not come under the influence of those conditions which seek to retard the development of the spiritual life of the race, and from their high vantage ground they can realize what is necessary to be done to move forward the great body of human life onto a plane of existence superior to that which they are at present occupying.

Sects and parties as long as they are faithful to their obligations by obeying the revelations of the higher law will be used as instrumentalities to announce unto the world the testimony of the gospel of redemption from the false and degrading influences of the lower law, presenting for the world's acceptance the superior benefits to be derived by a recognition of the higher. If they fail of performing that exalted and honorable duty which is placed upon them and come under the influence of those conditions which they started out with so much zeal to emancipate their own life from, and to help others attain unto that exalted state; they must not think because they are not in harmony with those spiritual energies that are advancing life to higher conditions, that such power does not exist; for it does; there never was a time when it did not, and at the present time it is making itself felt through those spiritual ministrations as never before.

As human life develops a higher grade of intelligence it becomes more sensitive to the influences that are impressed upon it from the spiritual world. The quickening of the conscience of human society has come through the power of those spiritual forces which has through the ages been steadily augmenting its influence over human life, and as it has increased the ban of condemnation has been placed upon practices which the conscience of former generations were too dormant to realize. For examples we will cite the horrible inquisition of the middle ages, the burning of witches, the death penalty for theft, and the slave trade. There is not at present a so-called civilized nation that will tolerate such barbarous practices.

As we travel along this ascending highway, receiving and incorporating into our lives this universal gospel of salvation, we are made more conscious of the growth and activity of that spiritual power as it is revealed by the manner in which it has condemned those practices which formerly were not placed under indictment, but which at present has the ban of the outlaw marked upon them. Threats nor flattery has caused that testimony to be silenced. In tones both authoritative and of kindly pleading it is calling upon human society to come up higher; to realize more perfectly the truth of the fact that whatsoever they sow they will reap, that they cannot "gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles;" it is striving to have them understand that if they would be successful in lifting the awful burden of crime and moral and physical poverty which even in our most civilized nations is hanging like a dark and portentous cloud over human society, they must remove the causes that are producing such conditions; go to the bottom and begin to build the structure on a solid foundation; realizing that license to violate the moral and spiritual laws of life cannot make it right even if it receives the sanction of all the parliaments and congresses and the highest law courts of the world. That purity of life and chastity in all of the relations into which human society is brought is not an idle dream or a flight of the fancy in the mind of the fanatic, but a possibility and an absolute necessity which must and will be realized.

The bitter conflict that was waged in the past regarding the right of individual opinion to accept or reject the forms of belief presented; they alone being the arbiter of that question, has, through the influence of the testimony of the Everlasting Gospel resulted in the elimination of a large percentage of the fanaticism which formerly was the most prominent feature; and while manifested in both religious and political controversies its fangs were the most deadly in the conflicts over so-called religion, so that it has become an historic truth that the religious wars in which the world has engaged far transcended the political conflicts in arousing the malignant forces of human life.

Happily the world has advanced far enough so that it has more respect for those honest differences of opinion which must exist in all progressive life. It is recognizing the truth that all have a right to worship or not, and in whatever form is thought the most acceptable. The assembling of a World's Congress of Religions where all could meet on a plane of religious equality would not have been possible in any of the centuries that preceded the one in which it was held. What would the founders of the old dogmas thought of the project of admitting the heathen(?) where they would be free to give their reasons for entertaining their peculiar forms of belief? It would have been more than their religious zeal could have tolerated. This advanced condition has been brought about through the labors of those souls who were at the time ostracised and denounced as the enemies of religion and many suffered death; but they were the messengers through which was transmitted that testimony which is redeeming the world from the false and causing it to understand and appreciate more fully the blessings of the ministrations of the truth.

The many problems affecting the religious, moral, social and political life of mankind are with earnestness of purpose pressing forward demanding a settlement and they will not be ignored. The evolution of human life up to its present state of development has brought them to the front, and nothing less is acceptable but as perfect a solution as the development of the race will permit, and it has arrived at a stage of its growth where it must solve the problems; it will involve radical changes in all the phases of life, and it would be difficult to find an individual would deny the necessity of action on some of those questions.

There have been periods in the past evolutionary growth of human society which were crucial, which affected sometimes one nation and sometimes another, and sometimes the universal human race. The operation of that spiritual law is not spasmodical, it is an incessant, ceaseless energy, ready to manifest its power in human society when the conditions of life are such that call for its action; and as soon as one problem is solved as far as human development is capable of accomplishing it, other problems are presented. Our own republic passed through one successfully in the mighty struggle that it made to throw off the incubus of chattel slavery.

That the most advanced nations of the world are approaching a crucial period of their existence is apparent to the close and intelligent observer of the operation of the forces that are moulding the thought of the world. When it will come cannot be predicted with a certainty, but that it can be long delayed is doubtful. How it will make itself manifest is also unknown. Sometimes they have come slowly working out the problem, imperceptibly advancing until the new forms of thought have precluded the old; and sometimes it has come upon the world like a peal of thunder from a clear sky.

The Everlasting Gospel is preparing the race for an advancement. The hybrid civilizations of the present time, and which are styled modern but are so only in name, they being an adulterous mixture of the new and the old, and it is trying to carry along that confusion of forces and incorporate them in the new life which is dawning upon the world; but that is impossible. President Lincoln aptly illustrated that fact when he said our republic could not endure half free and half slave, it must be all one or the other. So the present systems, religious or political, cannot endure unless they cast off their burden of death and enter into the new life; and we do not doubt but that they will turn their faces toward the light. That the forces of the spiritual world do cooperate with the efforts that mortal life is making to advance, is known to the believers in the spiritual philosophy, but it does not prevent the operation of the law of free agency; every individual must in a large measure be the arbiter of their own destiny, working it out on whatever lines they think best; but if they are faithful to obey the light which is revealed to them their light will be increased. The fields that have been prepared by the earnest labors of those on the mortal side of life and sown with the seeds which will produce an abundant harvest of higher conditions, are nearing the harvest time; and the announcement has gone forth to "Prepare, ye heavenly reapers,

Lift up your eyes and view,
The fields all ready ripening
With grain of golden hue;
And ye as angels of the Lord
With sickles in your hands,
Make ready for the harvest,
Prepare to reap the land."

While it is absolutely necessary that there should be a seed time in both the material and spiritual phases of life, it is as necessary that there should also be a harvest time, when the energies of life should be advanced from the primary department and other phases of life's obligations be brought into operation.

To those who are doubting, not believing in this spiritual power, or questioning its ability to lift human life to higher planes, we would say: Brother, Sister, let us not be fainthearted, but have both faith and a knowledge of the omnipotent power of the truth; and we who know the truth of the spiritual philosophy let us show to the world that in accepting it we have come into rapport with an uplifting power that has in reality made us heirs of that spiritual resurrection which comes by incorporating into our lives this testimony of the Everlasting Gospel which has lifted us above the false conditions that are holding in bondage less fortunate souls, and has brought us to a more perfect knowledge of the truth.

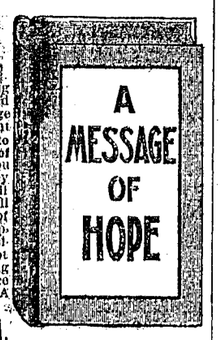
A MESSAGE OF HOPE

The Eminent Dr. Peebles with an Able Staff of Assistants has Discovered and Perfected a Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Suffering Home in the Land.



J. M. PEEBLES, M.D., A.M.

Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health, composed of some of the leading physicians of the country, have perfected their method of healing so that it can almost be said that there are no incurable diseases. This system of treatment is a combination of Medicinal Remedies, Psychic Treatments, combined with a system of Hygiene and Physical Culture and is so perfected that any one can take it in their own home without detention from their business. Years ago the Doctor concluded that nature had wisely provided a cure for all diseased conditions just as she had for all injuries such as cuts, bruises, etc., and he at once set to work to discover what this mighty power might be and how it could be used. After almost half a century of persistent study and investigation he, with his able staff of co-workers have given to the world a perfected system of treatment that is destined to revolutionize the art of healing the sick. The entire country is astonished at the almost miraculous cures performed by these physicians, but the Doctors claim there is nothing mysterious about it at all. They say they are able to cure thousands of those pronounced incurable by other physicians because they work IN HARMONY WITH AND EMPLOY THE MIGHTY HEALING FORCES OF NATURE IN ADDITION TO THEIR MILD YET POTENT MEDICINAL REMEDIES. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system, enriches the blood, improves the digestion and appetite, gives strength to the nerves and muscles and repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing the invalid of many years to rejoice after having been told by the local doctors "there is no hope for you."

Mrs. J. D. Stevenson, of Hillsdale, O., in writing the Doctors after a three months' course of treatment thanks them heartily for curing her of a long standing case of female trouble and falling of the womb. Miss Daisy Burke, of Kalama, Wash., who was completely cured of catarrh, sends a thousand thanks and says "I am almost the only person around here free of this dreaded disease." Harry McClure, of Pittsburg, Pa., corner Fifteenth and Bingham street, who had been troubled with kidney trouble and rheumatism for years, writes after four years of treatment with local doctors: "I cannot express in words the hearty endorsement I give your wonderful treatment." Mrs. Joel Curtis, of Method, N. C., writes: "I cannot thank you enough for the good you have done me." You cured me of asthma two years ago and I have not felt anything of it since. I recommend you to all suffering humanity." F. Villiers, of 992 N. Francisco Avenue, Chicago, Ill., writes: "When I wrote you I was suffering the torments of the damned with my stomach and had been told by the best physicians in Chicago that I had about two months to live. As a last chance I wrote for your free diagnosis and you told me I had a severe case of inflammation of the stomach. Under your treatment and sound advice I improved from the first and am today in better health than in years. I most heartily endorse you and recommend your treatment to all."

It makes no difference how serious your case may be or how long you have been suffering there is positive hope for you in this grand treatment. RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health, upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

A Multitude of Answers to a Circular Letter.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION

SHOULD SPIRITUALISM TAKE ITS PLACE AMONG THE GREAT RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD, OR BE ASSIGNED TO ITS PROPER POSITION IN THE DOMAIN OF SCIENCE?

Dear Sir:—Spiritualism has assumed special prominence throughout the world, and to-day the question naturally arises, what is its exact status, considered from a religious, philosophical or scientific standpoint? The fact that spirits do return to earth and rap on tables, write on slates, engage in endless contradictions in regard to things material and spiritual, speak in audible voices, paint portraits, mislead some badly and direct others aright, and do hundreds of other remarkable things—some good and some bad—has received world-wide recognition. All the phenomena thus recognized have been grouped together, and the general name, Spiritualism, applied thereto to represent the body or class of people who believe in the same.

Whether the phenomena, the direct result of spirit intercourse, should become the foundation of a new creed, a new sect, a system of worship, or the basis of a religious cult, or should simply be recognized as a scientific fact and treated exclusively as such, just as any new discovery always is, and no more sacred than any other phenomenon brought to light in the natural world, is a question you are called upon to consider. Whether Spiritualism should take its place among the great religions of the world, or the cause of its phenomena be assigned to a place in the domain of science, by the side of the wonderful achievements of Edison, Tesla and others, is a question of deep and significant import.

To-day the tendency is to make a religion of Spiritualism, and to promote that end, societies have been organized, and meetings open with singing and prayer, just as the orthodox churches do. Mediums have been regarded as ministers of the gospel, and are regarded as such when they apply for half-fare on railroads.

There are, however, a large class of intelligent and influential people who regard spirit communion as a scientific fact—that and nothing else—and they will explain the method of communication from a scientific standpoint, just as the scientist will explain how a message is transmitted by telephone or wire. They fail to understand why a religion should be formulated from the fact that Guiteau, who assassinated President Garfield, or Booth, who cruelly murdered President Lincoln, can return to earth and communicate with their friends. In truth, they cannot comprehend why a conversation carried on between the two realms, whether the spirits be exceptionally wise or good, or low and debased, shall become the basis of a religious cult, when apparently it belongs exclusively to the domain of science.

The fact is, spirit phenomena cannot be patented or copyrighted. Rev. John Wesley, a devout man, has related some startling experiences with spirits in his own family, long before the rappings occurred at Hydesville, N. Y. The Catholic church abounds in incidents where spirits have returned to earth, still determined to keep the world creedbound. The Mormons boast of the angels coming to them direct. In China, too, spirit communion is common. All through past history there is evidence that spirits have communicated with those left on earth. The method by which they communicate with mortals is in accordance with a natural law, using certain agencies connected therewith, just as the mechanic uses certain methods to construct a telephone, an engine, a magnetic battery, or a telegraphic line between two distant cities. One can not get out of the domain of law, and the question is whether that which is purely natural, purely in accordance with the forces in the natural and spiritual planes, should become the foundation of a religion, or whether it should be assigned to the domain of science, the same as any other scientific fact. We ask you to express your views in regard to the matter.

RELIGION OR SCIENCE.

Are Spiritualists Believers, or Knowers?

Whether Spiritualism be accepted as a religion or not, its growth as an organic movement, is affected only in the direction it is forced to take by such acceptance. Associative effort, the exchange of individual strength for that of united brotherhood, is too potent an element of advancement to be for a moment ignored. But such associations should be formed on the right lines, and the greatest care taken not to have them ape obsolete forms and methods, nor should the old names be retained for the new thought. The two-thousand-year-old goat-skin bottles ,which have held the old church wine, will not bear the strain of the new and fermenting must.

It all turns on what we mean by the word religion, and hence it is essential for its clear understanding that it should be accurately defined, and the definition strictly adhered to. Words are used for the conveyance of ideas, but when used in any sense that pleases the purpose or fancy, language becomes meaningless verbiage.

What is religion? According to the Century Dictionary—there is no higher authority—the original Latin religio meant, "reverence toward the gods, fear of God, piety, conscience, scrupulousness, religious awe." The accepted, basic meaning is, "A system of faith in the worship of a Divine Being or beings; as the Christian religion; the religion of the Jews, etc.; the rites or services of religion; the practice of sacred rites and customs." "Recognition of and allegiance in manner of life to a superhuman power or superhuman powers, to whom allegiance and service are regarded as justly due."

Such are the ideas, for which religion stands, in India, Arabia or the Christian world. Its first element is God, or the gods; the second, man; the third, the relations of man to God or the gods.

The observance of religion means the various forms and ceremonies, sacrifices, prayers, incantations, etc., to be observed to win favor or appease the wrath of God or the gods. In all ages, among all races of mankind, by religion this has been meant, and the moral aspect, at first not considered, has been always secondary. This religion has absorbed the greater portion of human thought and been the prolific source of more contention, war and organized suffering them all other causes combined.

All the sects, denominations, or churches in the world, accept the word religion as meaning just this, and annex thereto as an adjunct, a more or less healthy morality supposed to be a result. To realize this worship, mosques, temples, pyramids, shrines and churches receive their reverent worshipers.

What is the material out of which all the great religions, Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Shintoism, Judaism, and Christianity were formed?

All began in ages of ignorance, among uncivilized, uncultured peoples, who knew less than children, of nature and the laws of the world. They came in conflict with the elements and the invisible forces of the world; personified these, and in abject fear, sought to appease or conciliate by acting the part of slaves. Among each great race or nationality, when the preservation of ideas by writing was introduced, the mystery of the written characters relegated writing to supernatural sources, and made the written scroll sacred and inspiration from the gods. Even a written text, on a scrap of bone, or a word was a talisman. Hence all the great religions have their sacred books.

To interpret these inspired writings, which in India, Egypt, Persia, and the Christian Bible, required inspired priests, standing between the gods and man. The sacred books, the inspired priests must interpret best in a "house of God," hence the mosque, temple, and the church. Religions are not the growth of a day or a century. The religions of the races of mankind, the great historic religions, are coeval with the races which receive them. They are outgrowths from common beginnings of the peculiar and characteristic ideas of each.

The Mormon bible is the only "sacred book," which can be instanced as an exception, and this appealed to and drew together the ignorant and credulous, and really in a small way illustrates the methods of all religious growths.

An infinite god is unknowable, hence reason is the slave of faith, the priest the representative of God, and the sacred books reveal his purposes and will.

Now, having a clear idea of what religion is, we ask, is Spiritualism a religion?

Has it sacred books? divine oracles? Does it place God first and make his worship obligatory? Has it not on the contrary taught from its beginning that all these sacred books, all the doctrines drawn from them; all the speculations regarding God and his relations to man, are products of entirely erroneous ideas conceived in the childhood of mankind, and without the support of the superstition preserved by heredity, and of ignorance, would be retained only as curious myths and fables?

Spiritualism claims the right to know. It proposes to give the waiting world a science of spirit and the spirit domain the counterpart of material science. It reduces the realm of spirit to supreme law, and declares the origin and existence of spirit as amenable to law, as the worlds balanced in their revolutions in the abyss of space.

In the strictest meaning of words it is a science.

What is science? By the same authority:

Science—the original Latin, Scientia, "knowledge, comprehension, or understanding of facts or principles."

"Knowledge gained by systematic observation, experiment and reasoning; knowledge co-ordinated, arranged and systematized; also, the prosecution of truth as thus known."

When, therefore, the word science is used, its meaning is knowledge, to know, the birthright of man. Man in the Sanskrit is manu, the thinker. To give accurate knowledge in the psychic realm is the purpose and object of Spiritualism, and only so far as it accomplishes this has it purpose and object. Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Catholicism, and Protestantism all have the belief in future life, but it is belief, trusting faith. They make no claim to demonstration. They repudiate science. They depend absolutely on their sacred books, and the divine endowment of their priests.

Spiritualism comes to demonstrate; to take all the facts in the border provinces of mesmerism, hypnotism, telepathy, clairvoyance, psychometry, healing, ghosts, visions, trance, dreams, and spirit manifestations and unitize all by the supremacy of law. It gives the origin, development, and future unfoldment of the individual spirit. It is the science of life, here and hereafter. This distinguishes it from all religions and all other systems of psychology.

There is not an archway or corridor in its vast temple, whose foundations are laid in the physical world, whose dome is in the spheres of heaven, where the knee is bent in superstitious reverence. There is no being in the universe for whom it demands prostration, sacrifice, and prayers; who interferes with the affairs of mankind or who can be turned from his purpose by pleadings for mercy.

Man being a progressive, instead of a fallen being, makes for righteousness, and no savior stands for his redemption from sin, but he must work out his own salvation. The birthright of man is his spirit life, and his destiny is the infinite development of his spiritual nature. This is accomplished by the acquisition of knowledge and not by devotion; by the study and application of the laws of his being and not by the religious forms, and faith in things unseen.

It it were possible to take spiritual communications and out of them all by a council, make a book as an infallible guide, with an order of endowed exponents, and stop from that moment the great tide of communication in its course, then there could be a church founded, a religion established, an order of priests instituted.

But the tide of communication cannot be checked. The age has long since passed when a council can decide what men shall believe or not believe. Such council would be antagonistic to the vital affirmations of the new spiritual science. The communications are too diverse, too conflicting to be harmonized into infallible authority. The other world is as diverse, as individualized in opinion as this.

It is claimed by those who desire to formulate a religious association on the new Spiritualism, that the elements essential have been retained. They say: "We have a God under the term 'Infinite Mind of the Universe;' we have kept Jesus Christ in sight, not as the son of God more than other men, but as a noble reformer and great medium; we do not have the old-time faith in the efficacy of prayer to change God's purposes, but praying sounds religious and warms up those who pray; we want to have buildings erected for worship, and ordained pastors, and so much of the old forms as will give respectability to the cause. Why, then, have not a religion?"

You have the form, but Spiritualism has escaped you; you have the cage, not the bird which has claimed its inborn freedom.

You have not a religion because you have not a single element that enters into the formation of a religious system, and for you to use the term is as unwarrantable and misleading as for the American Association for the Advancement of Science to call itself a religious body.

Even the moral code while secondary to all religious systems, and made the excused for their being, with the new science of spirit, is no longer a loose compilation of moral commands from an external source, but expression of man's moral nature, to be investigated and studied as any other department of knowledge.

Let us not delude ourselves into the belief that we have in Spiritualism "the coming religion," "the religion of the future," a "religion that will take the place of all others." We are several thousands of years passed the age when religious systems began their growth, and history does not repeat itself. The great stream of human progress will never return to the quaking bog-lands brooded over by darkness, from which it flowed.

There is no "religion of the future," for religion is of the past. Religion is the reign of the gods. The future is the reign of man as a spirit endowed with infinite possibilities. The future is of knowledge, not only of material things, but of spiritual being here and hereafter. "I believe," "I have faith," yields to "I know."

HUDSON TUTTLE.

A CONSISTENT ANSWER

To Two Very Important Questions.

Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world? or Should it be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?

These interrogations by the editor of The Progressive Thinker are exceedingly timely and The Progressive Thinker as a journal of progress is a fitting place to consider them. The non-progressive thinker—pardon the paradox—would not think to make such inquiry, however important it might be to the welfare of mankind. He is still mumbling that "the religion of his father and mother and his grandmother is good enough for him." He was lulled into a hypnotic, non-progressive ecclesiastical slumber by the soothing influence of that old hymn.

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

The mentality of to-day that can be cuddled into religious quietude by the somniferous influence of a sentiment so meaningless is this, is not far removed from the mental status of mere animated protoplasm. Don't take it to heart, dear reader, "For of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Shall the Spiritualists continue the sentiment of meaningless platitudes and religious formula in hymns and prayers? Hymns that outrage common sense.

"Far from my thoughts, vain world begone,
Let my religious hours alone."

Just as though a singer wants to push the infinite of infinitude away. Just as though the world if God made it, is not a spiritual world. What is that mental condition that a poet or a singer gets into when he is ashamed of the world or any portion of it that he claims his God made—he wants it to begone?

"Rock of Ages cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee."

Here is another meaningless, sentimental sophism, and as a hymn it has received more praise than most hymns that have been written. And the Spiritualists are using it many localities. Yet, what does it mean? To whom or what does the metaphor, "Rock of Ages," refer? Does it mean "Christ and the atonement," or does it refer to religion as a special system of saving grace? How can a man hide himself in either position. No honest Christian would admit that religion was a repository for rascals or a cover for hypocrisy. Then again no honest man would want to hide himself, and however frequently men wear the livery of religion as a business mask, quite frequently their sins find them out, and they bring up in some penal institution. If "Infinite Intelligence" does not nauseate at all of this cajolery of words and fantastic sentiment, it will be because he does not appreciate the irony of ignorance.

Shall we continue to mumble meaningless, senseless, hypocritical prayers in public, to be seen of men? Shall we continue to ask God and the angels for benefits impossible to be given? Shall we ask God or the spirit world to do things which if complied with would introduce a miracle by abrogating some eternal principle of nature, or would reduce cosmic process to chaos, and blow the petitioner of a locality and its inhabitants "to kingdom come!"

How is the spirit world or God going to "draw very near to us"—any nearer than they are? How is God going to "hasten the time when all men will worship him in spirit and truth?" Can time be hastened? Why ask the spirit world to do what God cannot do? If God operates through immutable law, why ask him to change his immutable law in answer to prayer? What would happen if immutable law was suddenly changed? Where is the sense in asking God to "deal with us as thou wilt in the dispensations of thy providences?" and then when we are sick, we wish for a doctor to set God's providences aside! Which is the most potent, God's dispensations of sickness, or Dr. Cureall's homeopathic remedies? To whom do we pray the loudest and most effectually in such cases? Why, to the doctor, to be sure. But who gets the praise when we are well? God, of course! Is this just? Render unto Caesar the things that belong to Caesar, but unto God the things that belong to God. If we were to follow this injunction, Dr. Cureall would get the praise of cure, and God the merit of making you sick. But this wouldn't be religious.

Then, to whom should we pray? Which of the forty-seven gods mentioned in the Bible should we invoke? Should we call on Astaroth, Tammus, Adonis, Dagon, Moloch, Baal, Baalpeor, Beelzebub, Yahve or Jehovah? Now, dear reader, all of the forty-seven gods from Astaroth to Jehovah inclusive, were only tutelary gods—the spirits of deified men.

Is there any Spiritualist who believes that Jehovah—a tutelary god—made the the heavens and the earth? Is he not the "Throne of Grace" referred to most frequently in Hebrew Theogony? Did the spirit of a deified man at the inception of the Hebrew race make "the immutable laws" of the universe? Is he the "First Great Cause" of infinitude? Is he the "Overruling Power," the "Infinite Intelligence" that so much has been said and written about during the last two years? What carelessness is this that attaches so much importance to one of the Hebrew gods which they in the day of their captivity brought with them from Egypt? What lack of thought and careful consideration that would weave into the warp of the spiritual philosophy, the weft of pagan festivals and the worship of their tutelary and domestic gods.

How can any consistent Spiritualist who has the opportunity of investigating the history of the Hebrew race, and their theogony with its numerous gods, consent to pose in prayer in public to any of these incestuous deities?

How long, oh, how long must the philosophy of the soul's progression be coiled into the fallacies of a pagan age while all mankind and civilization are held in the throes of ecclesiastical superstition.

No! No!! No!!! gentlemen. Spiritualism has no place among any of the three hundred and twenty systems of religion of the past or present. The evolution of the human soul and its existence beyond the grave is a fact in nature's order of cosmic progression. The natural relation the spirit holds to the mortal plane is a part of the mathematics of the cosmic corelations of mental forces; and it was a truth before the inception of the Hebrew race, or before man existed on this planet. Bibles, sacred cosmogonies, the gods worshiped by different nations, crucified saviors, and other godly sacrifices have nothing to do with this fact. Spiritualism needs nothing so much as to be lifted out of the slums of superstition, and placed before the thinkers of the world as a cosmic truth—a truth that science to-day can demonstrate.

W. M. LOCKWOOD.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Not Among the Great Religions, but Above Them.

In response to your "Important Question," I respond that Spiritualism should not take its place among the great religions of the world, for the potent and patent reason that it is not a religion in any such sense of the word as are those religions. They are all founded upon some God or gods, and their essence is worship of those gods. Spiritualism has rejected all these gods and has not as yet made another although the N. S. A. made an effort so to do, but with very poor success. In any sense attached to the word religion in the past, or conceived by its inventor, Spiritualism is not a religion. But a rigid analysis of human development furnishes us with the basic idea and fact from which all religions have been evolved, and it also includes Spiritualism. This analysis gives us this definition of religion, in its universal and elementary sense, viz., the mental attitude of man toward the invisible. Hence, all men are religious. Some are positivists: The invisible is as real to them as the visible. Others are negationists: The visible present is all of man; he has no conscious being after death. Others are know-nothings: They don't know, but hope.

Religion, thus defined is no more holy than any other branch of science, and, until something is added to the root idea, all the rigmarole of prayer, invocation and worship is absolutely incongruous and absurd.

Spiritualism, at its basis, is simply and only the affirmation of the reality of the invisible, and that the invisible real manifests itself only through living men and women. It has no more reference to any god than the telegraph or telephone. But as telegraphy is a branch of science, so also is Spiritualism. And we claim it to be the highest department of science. It is the science of the sciences. It is a new method of using nature's forces, and its primary phenomena demonstrate its perfect naturalness. The researches of the last fifty years, although they may not have made clear all the workings of man's psychic nature, have at least demonstrated the fact that so-called spirit manifestations are as well understood as the action of the heart, the hypnotic trance or telegraphy, and that there is no more god in one than the others. They have also demonstrated that the phenomena are produced by the workings of the most recondite and esoteric forces of life, involving all the susceptibilities and energies of the human organism, especially the organic nerves. Hence, Spiritualism should take its place not among the great religions of the world, but above them, as the culmination of all the reality embodied in their vague notions and strivings; and the law of its phenomena should be assigned to a place in the domain of science by the side of the wonderful achievements of Edison, Tesla and others.

But it seems to me that that "large class of people, who regard spirit communion as a scientific fact—that and nothing else—and who will explain the method of communication from a scientific standpoint, just as the scientist will explain how a message is transmitted by telephone or wire," are partial or defective in their conclusions. They do not include in their conclusions what is contained in their premises.

A phenomenon or fact has four elements, none of which can be omitted. They are these, viz., 1. Something done; 2. A doer; 3. The law or method of the doing; 4. The purpose or tendency of the doing. As to the first three elements there is a substantial agreement among this "large class of people." But as to the fourth element there is wide divergence, and the most paltry and insignificant, if not criminal motives are assigned as the end sought by the advent of Modern Spiritualism.

The principal analogy between telegraphy and spirit phenomena is, that natural energies are used in producing them. But, as shown above, the energies which produce spirit phenomena are the highest, the most occult of life's production, while telegraphy is the action of mechanical energy directed by human intelligence. These two modes of motion are unlike as lightning and thought. Science includes more than the mechanism of all the machinery of the world. It includes not only the physical system of man, but also the vast scope of his intellectual conception, and the boundless ocean of his partly developed love, conjoined with the impulsions of his ethical nature. The infinite, impersonal life, in its outworkings, has produced the personal ego. And the blind tendencies of automatic life become intelligent purpose in the ego. And that purpose, which at first was purely selfish, becomes altruistic in the most developed man.

If Modern Spiritualism is anything more than the vagaries of dreamland, it demonstrates the existence of an invisible world of intelligences equal to ourselves, and hence, the thousands of developed souls must be inspired with the most sublime altruistic purpose, and that purpose is the real life of Spiritualism. And this is strictly scientific, and Spiritualism thus becomes the science and philosophy of life. As the cosmic, impersonal life, through countless eons, has tended to the production of one grand end—a personal, self-conscious life; so also the personal life, through all the ages of superstitious religionism, has tended to the advent of the scientific demonstrations of the spiritual era. And that personal life, as embodied in the highest circles of spirit existence, is one mighty purpose to uplift humanity to the altruistic plane of universal brotherhood.

But it would be as reasonable, as scientific, to say that nature tended, or intended to put the ox, sheep and horse beside the huge monsters of the saurian period, as to assume that Spiritualism should take the position of a "religious denomination" by the side of the great world religions. The tendencies of nature swept those former monsters from the physical world, as they are now surely working to sweep those mental monstrosities, called religions, from the faith and consciousness of developed manhood.

But the life, which to-day gambols in the lamb, propelled the monster saurian of the long ago. And the songs of the lark and nightingale are expressions of the same life which uttered the wild screams of the huge lizard birds of vanished time.

So the altruistic life of developed Spiritualism is the same that evolved the monster religions of the past and present, for all of them are the different mental attitudes of man to the invisible. But nature waves her scientific wand and all the horrid progeny of superstitious ignorance, gods, devils, heavens and hells pass away, and the sun of Eternal Reason shines forth undimmed forever.

SPIRITUALISM

Is a Science and a Philosophy.

In its general aspect Spiritualism is a philosophy, for it seeks to explain humanity and nature, both as to essence, or real being, and as to phenomenon. As in all systems of philosophy worthy the name, there is in Spiritualism a fundamental truth, or postulate, by which all principles and phenomena, facts and ideas, are tested, or judged, and through which they become susceptible of rational interpretation.

Now, what is this fundamental truth of Spiritualism?

To my conception it is this: That the substratum, or underlying reality, of the universe is spirit.

Certainly no Spiritualist would question the statement that man is a spirit; for to do so would be to place himself outside the pale of Spiritualism altogether.

If man is a spirit, or spirit, what is nature? Here there may be ground for difference. Some Spiritualists may hold that the universe external to man is, in its essence, a real substance of a material nature; while others may claim that its essence or substantial being, is also like man, spirit.

If we must unitize the essence of all being, both of man and nature, that essence, in the light of the demonstrations of Spiritualism, must be spiritual and not material; but if we are inclined to dualism and can admit of two bases, or fundamental postulates, representative of two real and substantial elements in the universe, we may have matter and spirit, with some sort of mutual relationship and adjustment of the two which makes hypostatic being possible. But this latter conception involves a tertium quid, which though neither matter nor spirit, must form the common ground or raison d'etre of both and make their relationship not only possible and tolerable but accordant and real.

Viewing Spiritualism in its popular sense, it is found to possess one all predominant characteristic, namely, the scientific demonstration of a present, existent, real, spiritual world, into which man immediately enters at physical, or somatic death; and thus far Spiritualism is a science. It establishes as a scientific truth the fact of the existence of man after death in a spiritual world, that is, in a spiritual environment more perfectly adapted to the nature and movement of free spirit than the grosser or material environment from which the spirit has emerged.

Spiritualism, therefore, answers the question of the ages, and lays the foundations of the hope of mankind upon the bed-rock of knowledge instead of upon the fleeting quicksands of faith alone.

But is not Spiritualism a religion? Not if religion means simply belief in dogma, and blind obedience to hoary teachings however exalted. Not if religion means the stifling of human reason before the throne of authority however antiquated and revered. Not if it means the abjuring of the duties of the husband, the wife, the father, the mother, the daughter and son, the neighbor and citizen, for the ignis fatuus of a false devotion to the gods of the past—or, of the present.

Religion is the swaddling clothes of the race; it is the make-shift which the undeveloped spiritual man clutches at in order to save himself from supposed destruction. Spiritualism is the religion of reason befitting the full-grown spiritual man who, under its benign influence becomes a law unto himself and capable of judging for himself of that which is right. Religion bespeaks weakness, dependence and slavery. Spiritualism is strength, independence and freedom. One mastery only does the devotee of Spiritualism own—that of the truth. Religion prays; Spiritualism works. Religion sacrifices the first fruits of the earth, the best and noblest, to appease the anger of an insulted deity. Spiritualism revels in the beauties of nature and loves and fosters the good and true wherever found, without any fear of the bogies and ogres of the fading superstitions of the past.

One who is a Spiritualist may also be a theist, a deist, an agnostic, or an atheist, when it comes to the question of the absolute; but he cannot be a materialist; and, if he listen attentively to the "whisperings of the angels" he will soon perceive that in the spiritual reckoning he who worships at the shrine of truth and loves his fellow-man fulfills all the requirements of the law.

For modes of faith, let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

A most interesting fact in connection with Spiritualism, and one which bespeaks in no small way its genius, or inspiring spirit, is the fact that it is gradually but surely permeating the whole intellectual life of the civilized world. Outside of Spiritualism no one really knows whether man is a spiritual entity destined for another sphere of existence or not; and more and more are the leaders of religious, philosophic and scientific thought turning to this one light in the darkness and telling the multitudes that if there be any sure guaranty of the continued existence of man beyond the grave it is to be found alone in the demonstrations of Spiritualism.

The fact established that the spirit lives after the death of the body and enters into a new and a higher life, the question remains, Cui bono? so far as this present life is concerned. This leads to the ethical side of the subject. To some men the knowledge that they are spirits who are to live forever in a spiritual world brings no new or higher conceptions of life and its duties here below. For such, Spiritualism bears no message. But to those whose conceptions and feelings are enlarged, deepened, broadened and intensified by such knowledge, Spiritualism is the fulfillment of the soul's desire, the realization of the dreams and hopes of the mortal life. It is an illumination, a radiance divine, a celestial visitation, the true god, the light of the world, which has come with healing in its wings for the regeneration of the nations.

The evolution of man has been from the brute-man upward to the spiritman, and the goal of the struggle is that divine spiritual brotherhood which recognizes the true life as a life of the spirit and the true destiny as an unending march from sphere to sphere of progressive spiritual unfoldment—always higher, never lower. The universe is infinite and eternal. That which lies beyond the circle of our knowledge and experience is greater than that which the circle enfolds, and thus will it ever be; but the circle itself may forever be pushed outward and the area of human thought and experience be constantly enlarged and increased without danger of exhausting the infinite store lying still ever beyond.

Thus it is that the grandest message which Spiritualism brings to the world is that man is a progressive spiritual being whose destiny is eternal progress in knowledge, wisdom, love, virtue, and moral power.

Spiritualism, then, is a moral science, or system of ethics, well adapted for the fulfillment of the moral needs of the human race. It not only teaches the importance of fulfilling all moral obligations to society and to the individual, but it affords the practically best, the most natural and most effective stimulus to private virtue, honor, sincerity and intellectual industry. In touch with the world of spirits the aspirational man allies himself with the upper spheres and their exalted dwellers and thereby becomes encouraged and strengthened for every good and noble work. As the demon of a Socrates, the silent denizens of the spiritual spheres impart to each recipient mind of earth the lesson—not destroying the free moral agency—most needed in its upward march of progressive development.

Spiritualism, then, may be said to be (1) a science, because it is phenomenal; (2) a philosophy, because it explains the true nature and relations of man and of his environments; and (3) an ethics, or system of morals, because it furnishes the only rational sanction, or justification of a moral life.

TRUTH.

O, voice of truth! O, light sublime!
Firm graven on the page of time;
A herald thou from age remote;
The Christ our symbol doth denote.

Long ages back, when came the Star
Of Bethlehem that shone afar,
And brought the tidings of good cheer
To all mankind, that they might hear,

And hearing, know the soul within
Hath naught of sorrow or of sin—
Then rise in strength, be not dismayed;
For love and truth cannot be stayed.

The God within bids thee arise,
Assert thyself; no gift despise;
However small or mean it seem,
Go, give it forth that it may gleam

With purest ray until each mind
On one great central thought combined,
Shall sweep the clouds and mists away,
And truth shines forth in perfect day.

RELIGION VS. SCIENCE.

Spirit Return Is Just a Natural Fact.

The question asked by the editor as to whether "spirit return" belongs to the realm of religion or science, was the subject of careful study and various articles by the writer some fifteen years ago. Those who have read and studied the Ego Series, and Man's Aural Self, appearing in these columns, should now have very clear conceptions on this subject. It is from the standpoint of those explorations that I will now make a very brief reply to the question, for the benefit of those to whom the subject is new.

Whatever fanciful definition may be given to the word "religion," it always implies belief in a supreme being as an object for adoration and worship. Science is the collection and orderly arrangement of facts; whilst the philosopher is ever striving to discover the meaning and lesson of the facts enrolled by the scientist. With these brief definitions before us we will try to apply them and learn the real lesson of "spirit return."

First, as to the existence of the asserted Supreme Being, who must have an element of personality or he could not be conceived by a finite mind. We live in a universe where intelligence reigns supreme director of co-eternal energy and substance. Every unit embodies all three. The universe is but the total of these indestructible units. The unit is the least we can conceive, and Deity is simply the expression of the whole of the existing units. These are the two extremes of the thermometer of life. A unit at one end, and all the units united at the other. A speck of intelligence for the unit; the whole of intelligence for the grand total which men call Deity.

Yet further, I recognize intelligence in everything around me, and I realize that our little planet, as well as every molecule as blending in Cosmos, is the output of intelligence. The conception of a Creator, in the sense of a being who has nothing to work with save his own will, is an absurdity to the thinker of to-day. But the presence of a guiding and manufacturing intelligence is as obvious in our planet as in any machine by which Homo controls his surroundings. The world and its neighbors in Cosmos are each intelligent machines, intelligently guided to an attempted result by intellects as much superior to that of Homo as his is to that of an insect. Such an expression man has called the power of God. The universe is full of life blended into molecules, some minute, others inconceivably vast, but whether large or small every blending becomes what we call an individual intelligence. Man is the highest intelligence we know, so we think of every "maker" as expressing manhood. Of course that is only a guess, but as a matter of fact our little planet has a "maker."

The next question is as to our relation to him, and his relation to us. Herein is a matter for interesting study. Whether he planned us as a race, or whether we are the result of a general law, called evolution, by which special intelligence guides itself, is herein a matter of no real consequence. But we can determine something of this Maker's responsibility by an illustration from our own experience.

Here is a magnificent ocean steamer, embodying the utmost of man's intellect up to to-day. Down in the depths, where the stoker lives and works, it is "hell." Up in the sunshine on deck, and in the luxurious cabins, it may, by comparison, be called "heaven." The maker—Creator if you choose—of that steamer has done his best. Under present conditions he knows no other way but to work his steamer on the basis of hell for some, that others may have heaven. The stoker may pray till doomsday to maker and captain, but he can only get out when some other intelligence takes his place, or the steamer would come to a standstill. We see at once that the remedy for that stoker is not in religious prayer, but in giving intelligence a chance to invent some other way of feeding those furnaces. As a matter of fact that stoker in hell can't get at the maker. He can only growl at the owner and captain, and at the folks upstairs.

We will now go a step further and ask if the maker of the planet can really know what is going on in the depths of that steamer, or in any of earth's slums? Let us remember he is necessarily as much bigger than man, intellectually, as man is bigger than ant. Of his size and shape we know nothing. Suppose the grandest intellect now on earth were suddenly promoted to be guardian angel of an ant-hill. Here are the ants with an intelligence, in some respects, superior to his own. They overcome difficulties and maintain order in vast communities, without a trace of individual selfishness. No room for a Tammany politician. But when this newly appointed guardian angel tries to tell them what a blessing he is going to be to them, he cannot make them hear him. He may hinder their work, but he can do nothing to help them. This in my judgment, is exactly the position of any intellect large enough to play the maker to our little planet. He can neither specialize man nor ant. Intelligence blended with substance and energy into a planet must have—like the steamer—its hell below. It's a Cosmic steamer, instead of an ocean steamer. There must be the stoker. He goes with the making. The remedy lies with the intelligences involved, which by slow experience and effort better their own condition. The fact gathered herein by the philosopher is that this hell may stay there for all eternity, so far as prayer to the maker can help or hinder.

We now come to another point of equal importance. I not merely accept prayer as a religious fact, but I believe there are often answers to prayer which transcend present mortal power. I believe there is abundant evidence that unseen intelligence does communicate with, and often help the mortal, when conditions permit. But this does not imply that the mortal has got the ear of God. Nor does it imply that the enthusiasts calling themselves "New Thought men and women" know what they are talking about when they assert that "All is Love." That statement is just an amiable falsehood. The stoker down in the steamer's furnace room calls it a "lie," and stokers in earth's byeways all say "amen." But spirit return comes in right here to show us that the dead stoker is often sorry for the live stoker, and ready to help him all he can. If stoker Tom, being in hell, calls out "O God," invisible Jim says "All right. That means me." And he immediately goes to work, with his spirit coat off, to help brother Tom.

Such is the extent and limit of the religion of spirit return. I know that many a poor medium gets into hell, and stays there, held down by every possible church and official influence. If the poor fellow thinks it will put money in his pocket to write Rev. before his name, and make prayers and invocations in a so-called church, I have no objection. But the God who will hear him will not even be the maker of the little planet, but just his brother man, now invisible, and with immense difficulties in his way when he attempts communication. But those who have made careful study of the Ego Series and Man's Aural Self will have learned that each of us has an Aural Self that can do much to help if the mortal prepare the way.

In no true sense is spirit return a religion. It is merely a natural fact, and only just marshalled by science among its other facts. We cannot use it to coax any "maker" to help us out of hell. But we can use it, with tremendous force, to stimulate our own powers to help ourselves. We can, like Marconi and Edison, take that which lies unused around us, and experiment until we grow more manly. But no prayer to any deity would result in wireless telegraphy, or a discovery of the X-Ray. Religion knows nothing of progress. It is science alone which makes man master of his surroundings.

Is the Plane on Which Spiritualism Belongs.

Should Spiritualism be made a religion? In my opinion it should not, but it will be and is already taking, not its place but a place as one of the religious cults of the world. The ranks of Spiritualism are made up of so many people who were once in the church, that they cannot be happy without a religion to direct the movements of their lives. But, oh, if the Spiritualist "Revs." and "pastors" would only invent something new in religion, or as religion! but to fall back on the senseless forms and rituals of Christianity, a system that has been the deadly foe of Spiritualism since its inception, is greatly to be deplored.

To be sure the N. S. A. did manufacture a new god, so that those devout ones who had no more use for "Jehovah," but who still desired something or somebody to worship, could have a shrine at which to bow.

Spiritualism for a number of years seemed to be free from religious forms and ceremonies, and stood upon its merits as a fact in nature, to be studied and investigated as such; but in these later years effort is constantly being made to introduce the paraphernalia of the church into its workings. "Revs." and "pastors" were not once necessary prefixes to the respectability of our workers. Baptisms, christenings, the Lord's prayer, amens, the Bible as the great text book, missionaries, Sunday worship, and a lot of other orthodox claptrap including eternal begging for money with which to run the conglomerate spiritual (?) church machinery now confronts us.

It is true, that there is a class of Spiritualists who regard spirit communion—the basic principle of Spiritualism, as a fact in nature, purely within the domain of natural law both in the physical and spiritual states; and yet this class seems to be powerless to hold Spiritualism on the scientific and philosophical plane before the world. Societies here and there are drifting into religious ruts that many liberal, progressive, up-to-date Christians are fast climbing out of; sensible Christian ministers, sick and tired of a title that distinguishes them from common humanity, are lopping off the Rev. and Spiritualists, many of them, are clutching after the priestly appellation as it falls, and adorning themselves therewith. How divinely beautiful.

Spiritualism conducted on a religious basis I think commands more devotees than if run on a secular plane. No doubt the local society is a criterion for other places. A few of us struggled hard a number of years to keep the home society outside the pale of religion, and succeeded on a modest scale. In the past year, however, conditions have changed! New officers have come into control and the meetings now are conducted as Sunday night religious gatherings, notices and reports of the same appear in the "church notices" of the papers, religious hymns are sung, etc., and the result is larger attendance and greater enthusiasm.

There is no question that Spiritualism will become a religion, and to me the signs of the times point to the time when it will be swallowed up in "church." It does not seem probable that Spiritualism can another fifty years maintain its identity as a separate and distinct system. The effort of Spiritualists to make this great movement a part of churchianity, and the effort of the orthodox church to assimilate the teachings of Spiritualism and label them good, sound orthodoxy, are the two potent factors leading to the amalgamation of Spiritualism and Christianity, and Spiritualism as such will be known only in history.

Already Spiritualist societies are discarding the word Spiritualism, and substituting names that sound quite "Catholic," and we have "The Church of the Soul," "Church of the Spirit Communion," "Church of the Star of Truth," etc., and no doubt soon we shall have Church of the "Holy Trinity," Church of the "Immaculate Conception," Church of the "Magdalen," and others of great and mighty significance.

It is too bad that Spiritualism must be the basis for another sect! Too bad that it cannot remain on the broad universal plane of humanitarianism. Everybody who reads knows how religion has been the barrier to unfoldment, to education, to progress. Every one has read of the awful crimes committed in its name. The foulest blot on our civilization to-day—that of capital punishment, is in the name of religion. Strange it is that Spiritualists pander to it when true manhood and womanhood towers infinitely above all the religions of the ages; but then religion is popular, it is fashionable. One principal feature of church "discipline" is to worship the pastor. Of course this is enjoyed by that personage, but it is humiliating to the people, and will Spiritualist "pastor" and people differ from others in this respect?

The outlook is not encouraging for those who would keep Spiritualism on the plane of fact and of naturalism where it belongs.

Why should Spiritualism send out "missionaries?" The very name of missionary is associated with war and discord, trouble, dissension, intrusion and mind-other-people's-business. If Spiritualism must proselyte, let it be under some name that does not carry with it so much that is belittling and harmful.

THE VITAL TRUTHS

Of Spiritualism Belong to Humanity.

It is difficult to do justice to both mind and heart, in such a question as this, and yet succeed in condensation so that it shall suggest the "Iliad in a nutshell."

Is this a battle between the head and the heart? Shall the critical mind be proclaimed the supreme and only arbiter, and the heart ordered to surrender at discretion? We think not.

The mission of Spiritualism is to convince people of their immortality, or rather, continued existence and to warn them of the relations of deeds to consequences. If one thing is clear, it is that men are saved by what they are, not by what they know, or think they know. Saved from what? From the ignorance, fear and darkness which are hellish.

Would that all religion was scientific and that all science was reverent.

Is Spiritualism to become a small and much abused department of natural science? Or, through religious societies, is this knowledge to be propagated among the "plain people?" and thus serve as a check on delusion and superstition? Is it to become subject matter for debating societies, for press writers, for academic discussion; or is it to prove to humanity the fact of continued or of eternal existence and a guide to individual conduct?

"Thought is deeper than all speech, feeling deeper than all thought.
Souls to souls can never teach what unto themselves is taught."

Are these two spheres mutually exclusive? I believe not. Both are developed from the central sphere of Life. Both are needed: the journals to enlighten and act as a wholesome check on too exuberant imagination, the societies as an organized remonstrance to the man-made creeds of the priests and as nurseries for rational spirituality.

The mother's longing to know that all is well with her lost child or companion is a legitimate desire. So is the thinker's aim that such knowledge be pursued intelligently, systematically and usefully.

True, religion is sentiment, not science. Its business is to interpret the universe, not to analyze it; to set its known facts in the celestial sunlight, not to scrutinize or classify them.

That religion has not confined herself to the limits of her own domain is too painfully evident. She has claimed the whole realm of knowledge as her own, commanding the scientist to get down on his knees and turning the philosopher out of his chair. Editors to-day stand up in defence of a system of nature which rational minds discarded 1,000 years ago.

Preachers stake their faith on interpretation of law that wise pagans pronounced absurd before their religion was heard of. This audacious and unseemly conceit alienates from religion the cultivated intelligence of mankind. Culture turns from it, education neglects it and science hardly disguises its contempt for it. If it is to regain its place in the respect and love of thoughtful people it must leave to science the things of science, and be content with faith and with the interpretation of great cosmic ideas, or with humanitarian works.

Religious philosophy has and needs intelligence and emotion, each necessary and inseparable from the other. The feeling softens, warms, glorifies the thought, electrifies it, makes it burn and kindle and glow. The thought gives firmness, substance, solidity, keeps it within limits, preserves its consistency, lends momentum to its volume. Without it, it is emotion without reason, heart without head. The feeling may be natural, legitimate, pure and sweet; it may be the pity of the compassionate heart, the indignation of outraged conscience, the enthusiasm of the kindled soul; it may be the woman's feeling toward suffering, the reformer's feeling toward wrong, the hero's feeling towards baseness and turpitude. Still, if it be feeling alone, unbraced by reason, unbalanced by thought—feeling unguarded and unrestrained by knowledge—it is apt to degenerate into sentimentalism and to become false, excessive and weak.

The academic discussion, criticism, elucidation, the teachings belong to the sphere of science. But the vital truths, the eternal ideas of Spiritualism and their propagation belong to humanity.

Boston, Mass. JOHN P. COOKE.

The Religion of the Eternal Now.

To the Editor:—Your communication concerning the future sphere or status that Spiritualism should occupy is now before me, and my version is as follows: In the first place is there so much inconsistency in the word religion that we should be afraid to employ that term when in fact it (Spiritualism) gathers together or collects the foundations of every religion of any note and proves by demonstration that the same law that permitted angels and spirits to manifest their presence to past generations will permit them to repeat the actuality of life beyond the grave by again returning to their loved ones?

I would not be willing to class Spiritualism with the superstitions of the past or present, but I am very much in favor of declaring Spiritualism as the religion of the "eternal now," which is the only philosophy that makes the past and future secondary. No matter how far back we may trace human life, or how far in the future we may be able to penetrate, it will always be in the ever present. The religion of the future will be naturalism, and that is all Spiritualism is, or ever claimed to be. I am of the opinion that we will not suffer any if we all hold the N. S. A. as the representative of the spirits both in and out of the body. The N. S. A. has been instrumental in establishing what prestige we now have before the public. It may have made some mistakes in the past, but as it is not a divine institution we could not expect it to do otherwise.

While I am in favor of having free recourse to science and philosophy, yet I am in favor of terming Spiritualism a religion. We must get together and organize and wage aggressive warfare against our opponents, and thereby protect our mediums and the free exercise of our spiritual gifts. We have everything to win and nothing to lose. Let all speakers and mediums take hold of our local societies and build them up and at the same time never forget to make a few personal sacrifices for the sake of the cause. Let the Spiritualist press build instead of destroy. There are some people that will always want a leader, and as a rule when most people discover that their leaders are worthy they will fall in line by and by.

I think that every one should urge the organizing of Lyceums, as our future in a great measure depends upon the success of these institutions. We must remember that while we are a religion we are still a philosophical class of people always after scientific facts.

A CONUNDRUM

It Is, That Still Remains Unsolved.

"My lord, take me seriously in the start, as heaven knows where I may land in the finish."—Helm.

In reply to your circular, "Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?" I think you, yourself, have come as near answering the proposition as your correspondent ever can, by "its proper position in the domain of science."

What is Spiritualism? "The system which teaches that all that is real is spirit, soul, or self; the doctrines opposed to materialism; the belief in communications from the spirit world." Here, according to Webster, you have it in a nutshell.

Again, if it be "our philosophy," as we hear the term rolled like a sweet morsel under the tongue of the fledgling, it becomes at once a general law or principle of science; a knowledge; a clear perception; a conformity to reality or fact.

Now what is religion? "A system of faith and worship; pious practice." As I have previously contended, there can be no such thing as "Christian Spiritualism," as Christianity is diametrically opposed to Spiritualism; the one advocating vicarious atonement, through the blood of Jesus Christ; and the other, self atonement, here and hereafter.

Now it must naturally follow, that a communication from the spirit world comes from some entity, once in mortal form, now on the spirit side of life, and the first question we might ask is, What Bible did they read or believe in? Was it the Koran of the Mohammedans; the Eddas of the Scandinavians; the Try Petikes of the Buddhists; the Five Kings of the Chinese; the Three Vedas of the Hindoos; the Zend Avesta; the Scriptures of the Christians, or the late Mormon discovery; the belief of Paine, Parker or Ingersoll?

Then again, which one of the Sixteen Crucified Saviors do they represent; and is it a one-headed, two-headed, three-headed god, or no god outside Nature?

You see the subject is so complex, that it would be an absurdity to try to harmonize inharmonious conditions—religiously, in order to build up a faith, cult or creed, as no two can agree. An old quotation might appropriately be mentioned here, "that man rushes in where angels fear to tread."

Now, honest, what do you—what do I really know outside analogy, as to the great future to which we are all hastening? Of course we want to believe what some communicating spirit says, some other more advanced spirit said, some ancient spirit told them that some spirit of light said so and so. But what are the facts—the truth?

"Yes, we have the truth," I hear so many say, and a smile must needs spread over my treacherous face.

"Well, what's the matter with you?" they ask.

Oh, nothing; only, what truth do you refer to? You see there are so many truths—the truth of spirit return, fought to a finish since 1848, and that you know upset all religion; and now here comes old-time Spiritualists, and want to start another religion. Then we have the truth of the continuity of life; the truth of reincarnation; the truth of the various planetary home theory; the truth of the earth-bound theory; the truth of obsession; the resurrection theory; the Jesus—the god—the gods—the no god or gods, and heaven knows what not, all thrown into the cauldron called Spiritualism, and boiled down to a chemical compound, ultimating in ignorance of the first principle of common sense.

I know, and I believe, we are two opposite points of the needle, and the only way you can make the two points meet, is to break the needle in the middle, and forcibly place point to point—but, then you know, it is rather hard on the needle. The secret of the whole problem lies in self aggrandizement. The old leaven has never worked out—'twas born there—it never will work out, until the spirit is separated from hereditary in its prison cell; then, perhaps there may be some hope of the future acceptance of facts as they present themselves. If evolution be true—and we are inclined to think that way—the present conditions are just what might be expected, as no two brains are developed in the same proportion. So let us individually seek out our level here, as we will surely be compelled to do so hereafter at some time; and for heaven's sake, do not let us act the hypocrite, for of all religions prevalent today, hypocrisy is the most contemptible.

Come, now, let us reason one with the other, and in time we may arrive at a truth or two, or sometimes a bunch. One truth is potent, and that is that coercion is religion; and religion is coercion—believe as I do or go to hell! Nice, isn't it?

Spiritualism is knowledge of spirit return—continuity of life—self atonement—a grasping after scientific facts, and can under no circumstances become a religion. I have just received an invitation from the Governor of the Home to be present at the great Munhall revival in Marion, in which religion reaches the very extreme, and the vicarious atonement—the everlasting damnation of the poor sinner, and the salvation of the few, is set forth by this faithful servant of the Christian's god, in eloquent exhortation to flee from the fire and brimstone awaiting them. So if our leaders wish to become popular; to make proselytes, build churches, save souls, start a revival.

And, Mr. Editor, Chicago would be a great place to start in; and if you can get a corporal's guard calling themselves Spiritualists, that can agree upon any one idea under the sun—past, present or future, our salvation is assured, and the ship is saved. But first a council—like that of Nice, or Trent, for instance, must convene and articles of faith—a cult—or creed must be found, and it might start with, "We know—well, no, we do not know, but we think—"

Seriously, Mr. Editor, this whole subject is beyond the ken of man, and I give it up waiting for the change called death to give me a boost into everlasting light or—well, let it go at that.

TO BE PITIED.

Is the Spirit Who Has Had No Religious Life on Earth.

Religion, to bind back to God, is a large part of Spiritualism, providing we accept the definitions of the word God given by inspired teachers. God is good; Spirit is God; God is Love. Unfortunately we all have had to wander at times far from Love, from perfect Good, and we all get out of tune with the Spirit of the Cosmos; and with heartaches many and weary souls, we acknowledge at moments in our earthly experiences that we wish we were "bound back" or in tune with the Good, the Love, the Spirit of all things.

Far too many superficial thinkers take the position that religion is necessarily unscientific; but "what profiteth a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" is no idle query, and the science of saving souls (Webster, the higher and better part of our immortal natures) is no mean study.

Of what profit is the life of the rosebush without the bloom? Of what good the lily bulb without the flower? Of what benefit the tree without its fruit?

So also should the spirit (Webster: Man's immortal nature) be so cultivated that the soul—the bloom, the fruit, shall come to a high grade of perfection in this world.

Many seers and teachers have declared that without a soul development of some degree of purity in this life, disintegration of the spirit took place after death. This soul goodness may have been doing quietly one's daily duty, may have been the love of flowers or of children, but it is a law of the crystallization of identity that somewhere in our make-up there must be love, even if in small quantities, or we have no soul.

It is more than ever to-day a science to induce people to think of God, and of Love. We have lost our comprehension of these things, we refuse to walk by faith alone, we learn to prove that our spirit friends really do exist, and we feel that it is unprovable that there is a Cosmic Spirit, far too frequently. The result is that as a people we are so lacking in reverence that we do not attract nor develop a working quota of developed workers. We are so coldly scientific that we neglect our own souls; and we are so afraid that a touch of religious life shall come into our existence as a body, that we appear anything but attractive to outside elements longing to come into our environments but unable to feel happy in our unprayerful non-religious life.

When people go out of the body it makes a world of difference to them whether they have been truly enlightened in religious matters or not. The hells (deep dark caverns, the graves, the depths, the sheols—the hades) are filled with people who drifted away from Good, from Love, from at-one-ment with the Universal Spirit. They may have been strictly orthodox Catholics, or Methodists, or perhaps inactive Spiritualists, but from those depths, out of hades, they cry to earth that mortals should learn to save their soul life while in the clay, that they may avoid the terrible mistakes for which they are paying nature's penalty and out of which they must climb by the exertions of their own weakened wills, and by the use of their devitalized soul forces.

The spirit who has had no religious life on earth is to be pitied. He may have been an infidel, a Hindoo or a strict Presbyterian, held a high position in life, and felt himself a religionist, and never have known what religion really meant. The grand Nazarene taught "Love one another;" a loved follower said: "This is religion pure and undefiled before God the Father, to visit the widows and the fatherless (friendless) in their affliction and to keep one's self unspotted from the world." And many Spiritualists who mistakenly suppose that religion means a creed, live the only definition given of religion in the New Testament, while they mistakenly curse everything called Christian; but it is churchianity, friends, which has debauched religion; but the religion of Christianity is the highest Spiritualism and identical with altruism.

The question of "Where we are at," must necessarily touch the consciences of all who claim the name Spiritualist. We go against the earnest soul convictions of nine-tenths of our people when we publicly and loudly express bitter views against prayer and the higher religion; we also turn many thousands of earnest minds into liberal churches, where the atmosphere is not clouded continually, "world without end," by such controversies.

Give Spiritualism into the keeping of the one word Science, and public psychism will be even more commercial than it is to-day; but make of its higher teachings the religion of all souls, and keep its phenomena under sacred test conditions of cleanliness and truthfulness for both seeker and medium; give workers a designatory name which cannot be stolen with impunity by tricksters, and the Religion of Spiritualism, aided by its Science and Philosophy, would sweep the earth of darkness, dry the tears of the mourner, bind up the gaping heart wounds of poverty, heal the sick, and make the nations of earth rejoice that the day of human brotherhood was at hand.

Sturgis, Mich.

Spiritualism Is a Knowledge.

Spiritualism is a knowledge of continued existence after the change called death; a knowledge of evolution to higher conditions throughout eternity, if such an expression is admissible. They believe the physical body is but an instrument of the spirit, constantly dying and constantly being renewed by the ingestion of proper material, to replace the worn-out tissues, until by limitation or the invasion of disease it can no longer be repaired; that the ego—the real man or woman—is the force, the finer elements which permeate the physical structure and direct and control its action; that this ego is indestructible, these ethereal elements eternal. Matter (gross) is inert; can only be acted upon, and this belief is reasonable and philosophical, and is accepted by every unprejudiced, thinking mind.

The god of the Spiritualists is the vital force of the universe, and is manifest in everything, from the blade of grass to man. Therefore god is not something to worship, to ask for favors, to thank for benefits, to appeal to for direction, but a force to study and comprehend as far as we are able to comprehend it. Religion, as accepted by the world and defined by one lexicographer is "the recognition of God as an object of worship, love and obedience"—"any system of faith and worship." Spiritualism is not a faith, but a knowledge; is not the worship of an imaginary being, possessed of various attributes, as love, mercy, justice, etc., therefore I cannot regard it as a religion. Love, mercy, justice, etc., are highly prized by the true Spiritualist, but he bows down and worships no imaginary, infinite personality, represented as possessing and dispensing these admirable qualities. In one sense—the quality of the life that is lived—Spiritualism might be regarded as a religion, as it is the quality of a person's life—his thoughts, words and acts—that constitutes his religion; but in all religions we find good men and women—men and women who go about doing good, feeding the widows and orphans, clothing the naked and comforting those in distress. But many of these people who go about doing good have a most ridiculous and unreasonable religious faith and belief. Each individual builds his own religious character by his practical life, whether Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, or what not, and his belief cuts no figure.

Spiritualists believe and know that under proper conditions they can communicate with the departed, and the various phenomena have been thoroughly investigated by the most competent scientists in the civilized world and proven to be spiritual. We believe we go into the spiritual world just as we leave this, the death of the physical body not affecting the ego; therefore we have all degrees of goodness and badness on the spirit side. The directions of the good, as in this life, may aid us in our work, but they are still finite and their knowledge limited, and we should be governed by spirit direction just as we are governed by direction here—using our own knowledge and reason.

Any honest person, of ordinary intelligence, at the cost of a little time and money, can be convinced of spirit return, if he will. Early training and a senseless prejudice are all that stand in the way of settling the question of immortality. He may know also that the laws governing life are the same there as here and that as we sow so shall we reap.

To sum up, therefore, in my opinion, Spiritualism should take its place as a knowledge, a philosophy and a science and not as a religion, which, as accepted, recognizes the worship of an infinite and unknowable being. We find believers in Spiritualism in every church, except, perhaps, the Advent, and in time I believe great changes will be evolved. Societies of Spiritualists for investigation and study are all right, but as a religion they are out of place. It is difficult to maintain a religious society of this kind, very many of the strongest and best informed Spiritualists refusing to join. Such has been our experience here, and I think it is the same elsewhere. Spiritualism, beside being a sound, reasonable philosophy, is a strong collection of demonstrated facts.

SPIRITUALISM

A Stone Cut Out of the Mountain Without Hands.

The absolute domination of the earth is divided between various sects, who have the assurance to call themselves the great religions of the world. Religion as a word, signifies to tie back, or bind fast. The most noticeable point, then, is the bondage to those who in the visible life have found places on the high planes; or to the creeds born of the affirmations of past ages; sometimes from the wise, but oftener from the otherwise.

Under such circumstances, it would logically be supposed that the masses who travel on foot, would be blindly led by the persons who were "in the saddle," for the use and behoof of those who ride. It takes but a little close examination to determine that this is the case. Not only are the masses led, but they are tied to the saddles and chariot wheels of the riders.

No religion has ever won its degree of "great" unless the earth has been overflowed with the blood of its zealots and their opponents. The psychic sense of the ancient clairvoyants became so tinctured with this fact, that we find them telling of blood that flowed to the height of the horses' bridles, in the struggle. The most tragic scenes of earth, have been the result of the conflicts of men about intangible and elusive ideas. Wars for thrones, kingdoms, or material possessions, fall of their purpose unless the spirit is appealed to by some idealistic, rallying cry.

We are familiar with the Christian slogan: "Jesus of Nazareth and him crucified." We also know of the later "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is his prophet." As the devotees of Confucius and Buddha have never exhibited any fighting qualities, except an aptitude for murder, en masse, they have no war cry on record.

To the Anglo-Saxon race, the beginning of the great religions or bondage to creeds, was the life and teachings of Jesus, who said: "I come not to bring peace but a sword upon the earth." No prophecy has ever been spoken that has had a more literal fulfillment. Wherever the propaganda of Christianity appeared, there was also visible, the baptism of human blood, aye, the overwhelming deluge of blood, human agony and suffering beyond the belief of a merciful man. The same facts are true of Mohammedanism.

The question is often asked, shall we seek to make Spiritualism one of the great religions of the world? We know it would have to go through the fires, if man by his ungovernable ambition should thus seek to place it on the throne of a tyrant. One of the seers of ancient times saw in a vision the form of a man, that represented all man's unbearable potency. He looked until a stone cut out of the mountain, without hands, fell upon the image of power and ground it to powder. Is there any symbol that would more fitly represent the inception and growth of Spiritualism than this? Can we not wait for the development of the great power of the world that is no less strong because its development is in the hands of the dear invisibles, who know just what and why they are doing the work assigned them? Let us have one world-wide thought unity that shall manifest divine purity without stain or flaw of man's infirmities.

Let there be no swimming in seas of human blood, and the accompanying horrors of death and maiming, that the tree of peace and harmony may flourish with a weird and nightmareish substance and condition.

Besides, the watch-word of Spiritualism is "FREEDOM," and not the tying back, or binding fast. It cannot then be a religion.

But as we are all seeking to gain knowledge of the things that are about and ahead of us, that we may grow wise in the Infinite Omniscience, it must follow that we are studying a science that is Infinite. Nor does that prevent us from organized and united effort, to thus attain the best results of concentration in our world's work. We have never been a religion, but always a science. W. P. PHELON, M. LET GO!

A Religion of Life, Love, Reason and Science.

I am always pleased to have the great and important questions of the day and age we live in agitated; I thank you for an opportunity to put in my oar, I may not row for shore, may get into deep water, deep or shallow I will agitate.

In conforming to space assigned me in the discussion of the subject, I can do but little more than declare my convictions which are the result of thought, observation and experience of the past fifty years.

I can never consent to have Spiritualism take its place among the great religions; the religions of the past have had their day, done their work good and bad, let them rest; we don't want their old clothes, old bottles or old wine. We don't want their God, Devil, Hell, Blood Atonement, Salvation from Sin, infallible Bible, public prayers hypocritical forms, or anything connected with their deceptive schemes of salvation.

I am ashamed that any intelligent Spiritualist can consent to adopt any of the present schemes and forms. It is amazing queer that while the intelligent portion, the thinkers, the growing minds in all the churches and religions are making strenuous efforts to shake off the incubus of dogma, restrictions and limitations, yet some of the matured workers are still clinging, seemingly to fear to let go.

Our leaders are crazy for recognition, then why not stand for something? As Prof. Denton used to say, "Why go down on our bellies? What does our vertebra signify? We can stand for the truth even if we have to stand alone."

The whole religious system of this day, of this age, is no more nor less than a club-house farce. Spiritualism has rent the veil, liberated millions of doubting professed Christians, given them a religion of continued life, love, reason, and science, relieved them of a hypocritical bondage, and it will be a long day before the great multitude of freed ones will be caught in any similar scheme of society or church.

If the history of the infancy of all religions could be written, we should find fear as the foundation, the chief cornerstone.

Fear the gods was the slogan of the soul-saver and missionary of the periods of the mound-builders, cliff-dwellers, and the stone age. There is no doubt in the mind of the writer, that the missionary of that long ago epoch was what we at this time recognize as a spirit medium. The cave-dwellers were human, they were led and inspired; some of them were mediumistic, they lived and loved, they were without doubt blessed and cursed by priestcraft, I hope more blessed than cursed. Are the ignorant, careless, stupid multitude of our day more blessed than cursed by the influence of the craft? A serious question that every one should consider.

Fear is the result of ignorance, but what would become of religious institutions, if the dogma of fear should be stricken from orthodox creeds?

Fear has been and is to-day the tyrant's power and friend; the selfish priest's most important weapon. It is love God with one breath, and fear God with the next; isn't it passing strange that a handful of ambitious Spiritualists have managed to get to the front, adopting some of the most deceptive dogmas of an old decaying church, and ask common sense independent Spiritualists to support such selfishness?

The world has been led by its various forms of religion, cursed by deception and hypocritical pretensions in all ages, and never more cursed by the unreal than at this hour; but we must measure the blessings and curses by the spiritual unfoldment of the individual, not by societies and material institutions. There is no other just measure; spirit power is to-day recognized, not because of organizations but because it is true and the light and life of the world.

Thomas Paine declared "to do good is my religion;" that sums up all there is of religion, science embodies it. To try to enlarge the sphere and usefulness of religion or Spiritualism, by adopting the methods of any of the various forms of the Christian, Jewish, or Oriental religions, is to put on ourselves a load not easily shaken off.

The present efforts of nearly all the societies organized under the banner of the N. S. A. are materialistic; the wealthy ones are sought, petted and invited to the front, just as they are by the churches; has black really become white? Let us raise our standard to the plane of science, this will enable us to let go of the past conceptions of religion and take hold of the present living issues.

Old hymns and prayers are all O. K. for those who are satisfied, tired and want rest; but live up-to-date men and women can't live on old husks. If we must, let us graft onto new vigorous stock.

If we combine, let it be to broaden, simplify and extend our efforts; to combine to limit and restrict is the old religious method. Let go—or go to the rear, is the order to-day.

It is easy for the ignorant, stupid, common life to adopt almost any religious dogma, but science cannot build on theories, selfish schemes, or general speculation; only truth that can stand alone can be used by science.

As I have previously stated, all religions that have ever existed, or been of any value to humanity, were founded upon spirit demonstration; spirit demonstration of continued life is scientific; common sense religion and science need not antagonize. Religion has been perverted by the clergy, they have distorted, belied and prostituted the truth for selfish purposes, and they are still at it.

Are not many of our leaders looking back and longing for the flesh-pots?

If organization is so very important, why not save time, money and friction, by getting into some of the well-equipped liberal organizations? They are all fishing for recruits and have the material outfit in abundance. They have recognition; they have schools, colleges, hospitals and asylums, and understand all the ropes connected with keeping the treasury supplied; this is one of the strong points, the cash in the treasury. They are just on the eve of combining for protection, too much religious competition; a religious trust would be a success from the start; it might knock out some of the rummage sale schemes, grab-bags, and annual bazaars, but what a saving of talent, time and money.

Much has been said in the past regarding the mission of Spiritualism; I am satisfied it has a mission, yes, an important one, it's a mission of liberty, freedom, equality and justice. All efforts thus far to fence it in, get a corner on it, have failed. To say that Spiritualism must be harnessed and hitched to a materialistic organization in order to have it fulfill its mission, is to load it down, clip its wings, blind its eyes, and hush its song of love and freedom. The spiritual has come to uplift humanity by spiritual methods.

Spiritualism is the only ism that has stood, or can stand the white search-light of science. Spirit power is master over all things and forces.

Spiritual knowledge and understanding is the only knowledge that will enable humanity to become a law unto themselves.

In the mighty revolution of the past fifty years, Spiritualism has stood its ground, saved its converts from the gallows, penitentiaries, hospitals, asylums and poor-houses; they are not on the lawless criminal plane of life; no other spiritual or religious cult with as large a following except the persecuted Jews can make such a showing, such a record; this record is a result, the cause is from the realm of the spiritual, of the masters.

Science has tested spirit phenomena and declared in its favor; let us stand for the religion of science, and its influence.

The question of continued life is settled, and an open door of communication with the loved ones gone on is of every day occurrence, for those who seek in an intelligent, trusting, receptive manner.

The Psychical Research Society of England and America should be sustained for its good work and continued persistence, for twenty years, in the investigation of the most important and far-reaching subject ever considered by science, viz: continued personal life beyond the grave.

DR. M. E. CONGER.

THE DIFFERENCE

Between Zero and Naught Is—What?

In reply to your esteemed favor of January 1, I will say: Spiritualism is not a religion nor a science. This is owing to a change, since 1848, in religious beliefs and doubts as to the finger marks of God in the Holy Bible; besides, there has been such a spiritual fermentation of conditions that no two Spiritualists are of the same opinion—all are in the fog of ignorance.

What has so-called religion accomplished? During the Dark Ages it established the Inquisition, murdered millions with holy wars, guillotine and instruments of torture, all for Christ's sake.

Through the mercy and justice of priestcraft nine-tenths of the human race have been sent to an eternal hell to fry forever; the heaven of the other tenth consists in rejoicing over shrieks of the damned and subsisting on the smell of the fry. Religion has ever opposed physical and mental progress, invention, art and science, and cherished ignorance for fear much learning will make them mad, causing their God to repent that he had made man in his own image.

Their love for humanity is but the sting of hate. Think of this, you half-decided Spiritualists who live in terror of the law enforced by preachers, priests and doctors who live in fear of losing their bread and butter. Many mongrel Spiritualists say: Why not blend with those who are not persecuted? We can have our churches, our D. Ds., our missionaries to send out, on railroad half fare, to the heathen; our societies and much popularity; and above all our case by making every poor devil contribute to our support. Why? Because we are the link between heaven and earth that will snatch many from the clutches of priestcraft.

But there is much danger in all this. It is theology repeated. In time such a Spiritual association will become as despotic as the devil himself, because founded on the tenets of orthodox religion. Early Christianity made but little progress until it blended with paganism, and this is why some Spiritualists want to blend with the churches. We are not against Spiritual organization; but let it be founded on the facts and truths of Spiritual science. In the unit composed of many there is strength, provided love, truth and justice reign. The brotherhood of man, the motherhood of eternal nature and fatherhood of infinite space depend on these potent principles.

Spiritualism is emphatically the Science of Life and Intelligence in relation to all nature. What is science, or what is life and intelligence? The analysis of these leads into the realm of eternal atoms. (1) Static atoms form the bedrock of matter. (2) Life atoms are the basis of automatic energy, force, action and motion. (3) Thought atoms are the fundamental principles of all intelligence which guides the machinery of nature, producing order and confidence in the laws of nature. These atoms attract and repel each other, thus producing all the variations observed in nature. This recreation is the law of necessity causing all things to flow in lines or currents of least resistance termed the destiny of man and all else.

Since all the parts feast upon the whole, and vice versa, new changes are introduced to supply the wants of all; it prevents stagnation, it causes growth and equilibrium among all the associated parts; thus the All Being becomes a self-sustaining, self-existent whole. A change here implies a change everywhere to keep the universe in balance. According to the law of continuity every effect must include its cause, which enables it to produce effects in something else; thus the perpetuity of force is transferred from one thing to another ad infinitum

It is impossible to annihilate anything; for the creative change wrought by evolution is but the sequence and not the cause of existence; hence immortality is as sure as the birth of change. It is also evident that the interchange and exchange of ideas and thoughts, from every source, is but a part of the programme of necessity. How else are you to obtain mental food? All this, including the atoms and their effects, constitute the facts and factors of a true spiritual science. Who will formulate them so they can be understood by mortal man!

Let all cast out their cupidity, superstition and credulity and receive the spiritual light of the departed. But beware; as a man thinketh as is here and hereafter, until taught the better way. At first such spirits are attracted back to earth as their home; through the love of fame some may announce themselves as George Washington. Bah! He simply proves that death does not end all.

Again, animal magnetism, telepathy, mind reading, psychic impressions, dreams, visions, clairaudience, clairvoyance and the subconscious self composed of thousands of thought egos and life egos, all are confusing; one scarcely knows whether it is himself or something else running the machine. But these are facts of experience and should form a part of your science. Again, the beautiful flowers, the trees, every object in nature, the mountains and valleys, are phases of graded life and spirituality; this also is the domain of Spiritualism.

Make your science broad and elastic. What if a lie is the zero of thought, it will round the polar cipher and return a fact. Keep the pendulum of facts swinging; it will keep Dame Nature's clock a ticking. F. R. LOCKLING.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION

Views of the Hon. A. B. Richmond.

Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?

In answering the above interrogatory, it is first necessary to ascertain and define the meaning of the term religion. My conception of the term is this:

Religion includes all forms of belief in unseen spiritual forces or powers. The direct tendency of which is to prove a future life or the immortality of the human soul, and its conditions in that life as well as its moral obligations to its fellows in this.

Spiritualism is not a creed, neither is it a cult, but a religion that asserts the immortality of man from demonstrative evidences as conclusive as the fact of his present existence. The witnesses of its truth live and testify positively to the asserted fact of a life beyond the grave. Faith does not enter into the problem as a necessary ingredient to its solution, any more than it does in the problems of mathematics or phenomena of chemical affinity.

Spiritualism asserts a future life and proves it by living witnesses who are now in that life and testify to its existence. It is not a scientific fact alone, any more than is any other well established phenomena observable by mankind. Science attempts in vain to account for it in speculative theories, but in the end is relegated back to the fact of spirit manifestations which are proof without regard to scientific theories or experiments.

Does man live beyond the phenomena of death? This question and its affirmative proof is the basic fact of all the religions of earth. Without this positive proof all creeds or cults are as visionary as the baseless fabric of a dream. The aid of science is not necessary to establish beyond a doubt this foundation of all religious beliefs, and which is the corner stone of all creeds, and must and can be proved without the aid of science or the logic of hope and faith.

In our courts an asserted fact is proven by eye-witnesses or an incontrovertible circumstance; the witnesses may be ignorant of the meaning of the word science, but they can relate what they saw as clearly as could a sage or savant, and are believed as their testimony may or may not agree with the common experience of the jurors. We all know that we can recognize the face and forms of our fellows, and even the sound of a familiar voice without the aid of scientific rules or formula. Science may it is true, assist in the explanation of the apparent impossibility of the facts narrated, yet if the evidence is clear and positive, the jury will judge the testimony from their knowledge of the truthfulness and candor of the witnesses, without regard to the speculations of science.

Now spirit visitations are proved by the testimony of innumerable witnesses, the communications are verified by the knowledge of those to whom they are made, of the circumstances and incidents narrated. They know without the aid of science that an invisible intelligence has related facts known only to themselves, and that therefore the mental personality of their friends yet lives, loves, and remembers the persons and events of their earthly life; and this testimony does not depend upon science for its verification, but upon the experience of mankind. This forms the basis of the religion of Spiritualism, and the evidence is so conclusive that no man can fail to see its undeniable truth.

I am seated alone in the darkness of my room, presently I feel the presence of an unseen influence, then a familiar voice calls my name and converses with me, and relates circumstances and even business transactions unknown to me at the time, but afterwards verified on examination of incidents I never knew before. Manifestly I am in the presence of an intelligence that remembers the past, that evinces the loves or friendships of earth life. This is not scientific evidence, but is more like the legal testimony admitted in our courts where the most momentous interests of life are involved in the issue.

Repeatedly have I seen life and death trembling in the judicial balance. The facts known to science alone were of no avail in solving the problem, but a human intellect is placed in the witness box and relates incidents that need not the aid of science to understand or explain, and upon this evidence alone the controverted issue is made plain to the uneducated mind in the jury box. Justice asserts her sovereignty, and right triumphs over wrong. Sometimes it is true science lends its aid in solving collateral questions of guilt or innocence from the incidents narrated by the witnesses.

So it is in the investigation of the religion of Spiritualism. The testimony of unseen lives and spirit presence proves the existence of facts that are far beyond the powers of science to explain; sad indeed would it be if these facts were to be ignored and the issue relegated to the laboratory of science alone for their explanation.

The learned explanation of spirit phenomena uttered by eminent scientists, of sub-consciousness, atomic polarity, or magnetism, is "Obscurum per obscurius" and only renders darker and more obscure the mystery that is involved in the windowless place of death. But to the plain common-sense explanation, of an unseen human intelligence that survives the disintegrations of the body and lives as a spirit, and sometimes returns to this earth to communicate with its loved ones on this side of the grave, science can add nothing; and if immortality is a fact as asserted by all the religions of earth, if this basic fact is proven by the demonstrative evidence of spirit phenomena, science can add nothing thereto.

All of the multitudes of religions of earth believe in the immortality of the soul, but they believe from the evidence of hope and faith alone. Science does not aid them, and demonstration is unknown in their investigations. How feeble is this proof and how uncertain its conclusion.

But the religion of Spiritualism proves its assertions by evidence so plain that he that runs may read. In the great tabernacle of human mentality and consciousness, Spiritualism stands in the very "Holy of Holies" and freely converses with the unseen visitant from another world. The alembic, the crucible, retort, and microscope of science has no place in this realm of spirituality. Human experiences, love and memory, are the only apparatus needed to prove the presence of those who fill our hearts with the recollections of the past.

Are there any religions on earth among men? If so, then why should not Spiritualism take its place in their ranks and even at the head of the procession, for it demonstrates the truth of the motto inscribed on the banner of every creed and cult: "If a soul once lives it can never die."

The moral ethics of Spiritualism will vie with the purest religious code of earth. Then why is it not in itself a religion? Why should it take a place among the diversified theories of science subject to the contentions of learned ignorance?

What other religion of earth can at the bedside of sickness and death afford such consolation to the dying and so mitigate the sorrows of the living? Before our eyes are closed to the scenes of earth, the religion of Spiritualism opens them to the wider and more beautiful vista of immortality. The religion of Spiritualism is

Slave to no creed or sect, and takes no private road,
But looks through nature up to nature's God.

Not a personal God, but the infinite mind of the universe, that directs force or creative energy in the formation of all physical forms with never erring infinite intelligence, or in the beautiful inspired language of Lizzie Doten, it is the God of the granite and the rose!

Soul of the sparrow and the bee!
Whose mighty tide of being flows
Through countless channels, Lord, from thee.

It leaps to life in grass and flowers,
Through every grade of being runs,
Till from creation's radiant towers
Its glory flames in stars and suns.

SPIRITUALISM.

Will Become the Most Helpful Religion.

Should Spiritualism take its place among the religions of the world, or be assigned to the domain of science?

The individual opinion of neither mortal nor spirit can decide this question for any but themselves, for no one can grasp the full scope of the movement; even those who consider they thoroughly understand Spiritualism, and are well informed as to the trend of the movement, cannot give a reply that will be universally accepted as authority.

From the dawn of Spiritualism, the trance, inspirational, and normal speakers and writers, have taught that the fact of spirit communion was but one phase of the great spiritual movement. That all phenomena were given in accordance with law, that in nature there was no supernatural, miraculous realm, that law reigned in the supersensuous as in the outer courts of nature's vast domain.

Hence, if Spiritualism is a religion, it must be a philosophical religion, one whose phenomena can stand the test of science, and its principles the analysis of philosophy, a religion whose sublime principles require no symbols to enhance their value, no dread of punishment to insure acceptance, a religion in accord with reason, and the most advanced thought of the age.

Spirit communion is an established fact, but facts do not explain anything, they are not sufficient to meet the demands of reason, an explanation of the fact, a knowledge of its laws, is required by the ever active intellect. To meet this demand, thought passes from the borderland of facts to the broad sphere of philosophy. Mr. Cousin says, "The day on which man first reflected was the birthday of philosophy. Philosophy is the recognition of ideas." May not a philosophical religion be one of the many victories of Modern Spiritualism?

Spiritualism has its distinguishing characteristics, and its glorious heritage. All that has been helpful in lifting humanity from barbarism to civilization, the facts of science, the glory of art, the splendor of philosophy, the faith, hope, and spiritual outlook of the religions of the world, are as truly a part of the heritage of Spiritualism as of any of the world's great movements.

The mission of Spiritualism is to aid in the spiritual evolution of humanity, and it has chosen as the most direct and successful method the presentation of its demonstration of immortality and spirit communion in connection with its philosophical religion. It has proclaimed not only continued existence but eternal life, the constant renewal of the spirit at the fountains of truth, perpetual draughts from the day-springs of spiritual knowledge, life attuned to the harmonies of spiritual existence.

Spiritualism has ever been the antithesis of materialism. One of its cardinal ideas, is that spirit is not a result of the evolution of matter, that consciousness was not born of unconsciousness. Individuality belongs to the Ego, and in no sense is dependent upon its relation to a material form.

In various ways Spiritualism has recognized the existence of something in nature not subject to the laws of matter, nor capable of investigation by material agencies; is not this the something Professor Tyndall speaks of as the undefinable, Spencer as the unknowable, and Von Hartman as the unconscious in nature? Does not the recognition of this power and the study of man's relation to it stamp the great spiritualistic movement as embodying more than the fact of communion between two states of existence?

Law is but a uniform method or sequence, back of law is will, and back of will is idea. Nature's arcane or secret principles cannot be easily cognized, the most powerful microscope fails to reveal them. The spectroscope through which light brings revelations from distant stars, brings no tidings of them, they lie securely concealed in the profound depths of nature's being only to be discovered and comprehended by those who look beyond the fleeting manifestations to the interior realities so clearly elucidated by the philosophical religion of Spiritualism.

To-day thousands of church members accept the fact of spirit communion. Do they realize the importance of sustaining the Spiritual press? Are they active in Spiritual societies? Are they doing anything to encourage, protect, or financially sustain mediums?

Are Spiritual publications found in their libraries? Do they consider it a duty to give the prestige of their presence at Spiritual gatherings? Are there not in the principles and ideas of Spiritualism enough to meet the intellectual and spiritual demands of these people?

We think Spiritualism will, in time, reach this class as well as the most advanced element in all organizations, and will become the most enlightened, helpful and influential philosophical religion the world has ever known.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

Are Harmonized in Spiritualism.

We do not think that "The phenomena, the direct result of spirit intercourse, should become the foundation of a new creed, a new sect, a system of worship, or the basis of a religious cult."

Neither do we think that Spiritualism should be recognized as a scientific fact only, and treated exclusively as such.

"There are, however, a large class of intelligent and influential people who regard spirit communion as a scientific fact—that and nothing else—and they will explain the method of communication from a scientific standpoint just as a scientist will explain how a message is transmitted by telephone or wire."

This is very true, and we consider spirit communion as a scientific fact, but spirit communion, is not all there is of Spiritualism.

We cannot weigh the philosophy of Spiritualism on our material weighing scales. We cannot measure the meaning of its deep and beautiful soul-satisfying religion, with a material yard-stick, nor can we be made to comprehend its sublime grandeur and glory through the material processes of the material scientists's laboratory alone.

Even telegraphy has a deeper meaning than the clicking of its instruments many miles apart. The phenomena of telegraphy is scientific, but this phenomena is not all there is of telegraphy; it is only a means to an end. It is only that which enables spirits in the flesh to transmit thought to each other when many miles apart. The thought may be either scientific or religious, or both.

The teachings of spirits through mediums and its various phenomena, are both scientific and religious. We receive instructions how to care for the physical as well as the spirit; how to avoid distress of body and mind; how to prepare ourselves for the spirit world, etc.—all of which may be scientific, or religious. In short we receive education along the lines of the spiritual philosophy which includes the science of moral philosophy and the truths of religion, all of which applies to our future happiness and present welfare.

Spiritualism means more than the science of its phenomena alone, though its phenomena have a great meaning, are beautiful, and absolutely indispensable.

True religion and true science are perfectly harmonized in true Spiritualism.

The moving of a pencil and the writing of an intelligent message or communication between two slates, without human contact with the pencil, when proved becomes a demonstrated truth, and when it is discovered what are the necessary conditions to produce it, we say it is a scientific truth. What do we know of the occult, the invisible causes of things, measured by the standard of material science? Very little indeed.

No one knows the processes of thinking, yet it is a demonstrated fact that I am thinking the thoughts that I am writing; all must admit that I could not write without thinking what I place on the paper in words. Still no science yet discovered can tell how I think, or how I control my hand to write. Is it not true that we accept of truths in mental science what cannot be explained by material science?

Then may we not accept of religious truths under the same rule?

A truth in religion is a religious truth. When it is demonstrated to be a truth it becomes a scientifically demonstrated religious truth. When the spirit world delivers to mortals a religious truth and mortals scientifically prove it to be a truth, it becomes a scientifically demonstrated religious truth.

A religious truth scientifically proven becomes a scientific religious truth, does it not? Then if there is a scientific religious truth, there may be a scientific religion.

It may be said there is no religious truth. If this is true, there is no religion? It would be as reasonable to say there is no scientific truth, consequently no science.

My conclusions are that Spiritualism is both science and religion. It is a scientific religion and a religious science.

As to the conflicting ideas taught by spirits and Spiritualists; they are but the opinions of the students of the spiritual philosophy who dwell on both sides of life.

Scientists differ in their theories; their theories and beliefs do not affect the facts. Where two scientists disagree upon some certain subject they cannot both be wholly right. One must be in error. We cannot declare that science is not a science, simply because some scientists are unscientific, and misinterpret the phenomena of nature.

By the same rule, we cannot say that Spiritualism is not a religion, because some of its communicating spirits are in error.

We have what is called science, and science is our savior, yet our science is not infallible.

We have what is called religion; and true religion is our savior, yet our religion is not infallible.

In my opinion one cannot be fully expressed without the aid of the other. There is one true science and one true religion. They are both facts in nature and there is no conflict between them. They are both united in one grand scientific religion, the one grand religious science, and its name is Modern Spiritualism. Every true Spiritualist is a scientist, and every true scientist may be a Spiritualist. Spiritualism is a fact in nature, and Spiritualists are students studying those facts.

Spiritualism accepts, embodies and teaches all that is true in every science, every philosophy and every religion. This includes all that is good in every bible, every church, and every religion. It has never denied a single scientific truth, but accepts "truth wherever found, whether on Christian or heathen ground." It has never denied the value of anything good, but embodies all that is good and all that is true in every science and in every religion. Spiritualists may not embody as much.

The conflicting messages can be easily explained if we accept what is universally taught by spirits and accepted by Spiritualists, viz: that spirits in the unseen world are creatures of environment, subject to their surrounding conditions the same as we mortals are to ours in this world. No Spiritualist would question the fact, ten thousand times proved, that dying does not give a man all knowledge. He must learn before he can know even on that side of life.

This being true, could we expect every spirit that reports from that side of life to agree with every other one who communicates with us? Certainly not! When we consider that everyone entering that life takes with him his own peculiar temperament, disposition, etc., coupled with his education and experience in earth life, how could we expect him to see everything as every other spirit sees it? We all know this could not be.

When a spirit reports to us, he does so according to his understanding of a thing. He may be right, or he may be wrong. He may be partly right and partly wrong. Whatever he thinks, believes or reports does not affect the facts. Facts always remain the same, regardless of what spirits or mortals think about them.

For instance, spirits in this life do not agree. There is the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, who declares in substance that Spiritualism is everything vile, hateful, wicked, etc. That its followers are the worst people on earth, that they are licentious, free-lovers, everything that is bad, and nothing that is good. Then there is E. W. Sprague, who has been closely and intimately acquainted with Spiritualists for thirty years and more, who honestly believes that Spiritualism embodies all that is good and true, all that is pure and holy, all that is beautiful and lovely; and that Spiritualists, as statistics show, are the best people on earth. We, Talmage and Sprague, both communicate our ideas to spirits in the form. We live in the same world. What we say or believe does not change a single fact. What is true will remain true, no matter what we say about it. We give our testimony, the people who hear us may weigh and measure, investigate and learn which is right, if they will.

So it is with the spirits out of the form; each one lives in his own sphere, each sees through his own eyes, while truth remains the same, regardless of their understanding of it.

One spirit may teach, through a medium, the doctrine of reincarnation, and another may teach that man never passes this way but once. Here is a contradiction. What will we do with it? Must we decide before we know which is true? I think not. Both spirits doubtless are honest in their belief. Yet one must be mistaken.

By way of parenthesis I wish to say, I have never known a medium to teach the doctrine of reincarnation who did not have Oriental guides, or spirits who in their earth life were taught and believed in the doctrine of reincarnation.

Where two spirits contradict each other, one must certainly be mistaken. The opinion or belief of either will not change the facts in the case. So it is with conflicting testimony regarding Spiritualism, whether such testimony comes from disembodied spirits or spirits in the flesh, the truths of Spiritualism will always remain the same.

Spiritualism to us is the philosophy of life here and hereafter, therefore so great that it cannot be comprehended all at once by us poor mortals, nor even by those who come to teach us from the higher life, as they too must learn before they can know the truth.

To me Spiritualism is both science and religion. It is a science, because science is the sum of demonstrated facts, and Spiritualism rests upon demonstrated facts; the demonstrated facts of its phenomena; therefore it is a science. It throws light upon material science, and demonstrates the truths of the occult and spiritual sciences; therefore it may be called the science of sciences.

A spirit appears, a ghost is seen, a dead man returns and communicates. Spiritual phenomena occur, all of which is evidence of another or a continued life. Upon this evidence religions are builded. Spiritualism is the foundation of nearly every religion. Modern Spiritualism demonstrates the possibility of the occurrence of much of the recorded spiritual phenomena of all history. It endorses all that if good and all that is true in every religion. It appeals to the highest and most holy emotions of the soul. It deals with the problems relating to that world where dwell our loved ones gone before. It answers the question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" and answers it emphatically in the affirmative.

For the above reasons, and many more not mentioned, I must decide that Spiritualism is a religion, yes, more; it is the religion of religions.

It is the only religious science, and the only scientific religion. Therefore, Spiritualism should "take its place among the great religions of the world." Yea, more than this, as evolution is the law, it must eventually become the religion of the world.

E. W. SPRAGUE.

Has All the Attributes of a Science.

You ask me to express my views on the question, "Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?"

It seems to me that in the circular asking this question, you have logically answered the question by showing that Spiritualism has all the attributes of a science, and none, per se, of a religion.

The first definition Webster gives of religion: "The recognition of God as an object of worship." And this is the usually accepted meaning of the word.

Now I have been investigating the subject of Spiritualism for twenty-five years, but I have found nothing in it that caused me to recognize any God as an object of worship. I could have carried on these investigations equally well had I been a believer in any one of a dozen of the leading religions of the age.

Webster's first definition of science is, "Knowledge; penetrating and comprehensive information. 2. The comprehension and understanding of truth or facts; investigation of truth for its own sake."

If these definitions do not make Spiritualism a science, and not a religion, then I do not understand the meaning of words.

Webster defines Spiritualism as being "A belief in the frequent communication of intelligence from the world of spirits, by means of physical phenomena."

What is telegraphy? A frequent communication of intelligence from the world of incarnate spirits by means of physical phenomena. Is telegraphy a science? If so, then Spiritualism is also.

I have a sister who leaves me and crosses the ocean called Death, into a foreign country. I also have a brother who leaves me and crosses the ocean called Atlantic, into a foreign country. I become anxious to hear from both of them. I seek Mr. Marconi and tell him I wish to communicate and get a reply from my brother. He says "All right; if the conditions are good, I can exchange the messages;" and he does.

The next day I go to the Bangs Sisters and tell them I wish to communicate and get a reply from my sister. They say, "All right; if the conditions are good we can exchange the messages;" and they do.

Now in these two cases if one is religion, the other is also; and if one is science, the other is also. One method is called Spiritualism; the other is called wireless telegraphy.

IS IT A RELIGION,

A Science, or the Ethical Basis of a New Life.

To those who expect Spiritualism to ameliorate the condition of mankind, the question is of vital importance—Shall Spiritualism take its place among the world's religions, or be assigned to the domain of science?

The betterment of humanity is the avowed object of religion, science and Spiritualism, equally; and the question is pertinent: Can Spiritualism best attain that object by assuming the name, garb, and ceremonial methods of institutionalized religion, or by aligning itself with the physical sciences? Or is there any real necessity for it doing either?

Good material out of which to frame an answer to these questions is found in the following prophecy recorded by Andrew Jackson Davis:

"A new problem is to be solved in this appointed land of beauty, fertility, and scenic magnificence. It is to be the birth-place of a new and comprehensive blending of human with celestial government. The epoch of theology is nearing its close. Carpenters are at work building the cradle of the new un-institutionalized religion. * * All religions must go. They are to be melted and run into one conglomerate mass of historic stuff not good for anything human.

"A prodigious revolution; a tremendous change in the thoughts and feelings of mankind in America is inevitable both in political and ecclesiastical institutions.

"Creeds cannot withstand the pulverizing advancement of positive science. Bigotry cannot set back the rolling tides of Universal Brotherhood. * * Scientific skepticism, under the sanction of high scholarship everywhere is the Nemesis which will crush institutionalized religion into nothingness. * * When the great army of Ideas shall appear under the generalship of Philosophy, spiritualizing the positive facts of natural science, then will the days of dogma be numbered, and the institutions of so-called Christians, who have made friends with injustice and with the Mammon of Unrighteousness, shall go down in lamentation and weeping."

This prophecy was uttered twenty-six years ago, and who cannot see evidences of its literal fulfillment? Who cannot see creed religion being pulverized by the Nemesis of Scientific Skepticism, and fluxing into a conglomerate mass of stuff, good for nothing to man spiritually? And shall the gift of the angels be cast into the dump-pile with the refuse?

Who cannot see how completely the great ecclesiastical body is being honeycombed with pride, self-love, criminal ostentation and hypocrisy; and shall the new wine be lost by being turned into these wornout creed skin bottles?

Creed religion has failed completely to benefit humanity, and the edict has gone forth, "Cut it down and make room for the tree of Spiritual Life;" and why should Spiritualism seek shelter under its sapless, leafless branches?

If it be true, as Swedenborg teaches, that "Religion is the whole of life, and the life of all religion is to do good," then all the religion Spiritualism needs is the Law of Life and the Gospel of Love. And the only scientific method it needs is the clearest, strongest, most convincing exposition of that Law and that Gospel as given by spirits through the manifold phases of the phenomena.

In its origin, teachings and purposes, Spiritualism is above and beyond all ritualistic religions and materialistic sciences and should not be anchored to the man-made methods of either of them, especially not to the festering corpse of institutionalized religion. Long enough have the tender germs of the Christ-life within the soul been crushed by the iron hand of priestcraft; and not until the cast iron methods of physical science have been spiritualized by the great army of new Ideas under the generalship of Philosophy, can Spiritualism hope for much encouragement or assistance there.

To enable humanity to reach the sublimity of Life and Love, Spiritualism should bring into the work all that is good, true, progressive and helpful in religion, science, and all other humanitarian institutions, without encumbering itself with any of the dead weights of opinion, belief, sacrifice or formal worship.

Spiritualism is the revelation of new and better methods of Life; it is the "comprehensive blending of human with celestial government;" and let those to whose care this child of angelic promise has been entrusted see to it, that the blighting, dwarfing influences of man-made institutions do not crush out its young life, as they did the spiritual life of Christianity in its infancy.

Spiritualism Among the Siences

Spiritualism belongs in its proper place in the domain of science. Its phenomena come under the domain of law and that which is purely natural and in accordance with the forces in the natural and spiritual planes and should be classed as scientific truth.

There is nothing supernatural in Spiritualism, all things pertaining to its philosophy and phenomena can be accounted for by natural law, consequently a better name, to our mind, is Naturalism. There is much in our beautiful philosophy that would supply a grand foundation for a religion, as its tenets are much in accord with the Golden Rule. It teaches the brotherhood of man, places woman as his equal; frees the mind of superstition, and makes us self-reliant and self-saving.

It shows man he is not an insignificant "worm of the dust," nor a non-entity, and creates an incentive in the soul, to reach out for higher and better thoughts daily.

It takes away the fear of death, proves continuity of life, and brings forth a blossom of eternal joy to humanity.

This causes a desire in some people to worship in its name, to become devotees to its teachings, to kneel at its shrine and bind together to further its growth.

Through organization it has, in a measure, become a religion, as we have our ministers and in some places our churches, carried on much as other religious bodies have. Yet all these are mere forms and practices indulged in by mortals and spirits, being, in part, fragments of early training and religious habits.

To my mind, Spiritualism contains more than all religions combined. It may in time be classed as a scientific religion, yet all the underlying principles of this truth are allied to natural law, and can be scientifically accounted for, hence, should stand in its proper place among the sciences.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1902.

Our Symposium.

In pursuance of its custom of presenting a wide and varied symposium of thought on some important subject, The Progressive Thinker this week prints the views of a large number of thinking minds on a question of vital import to the cause of Spiritualism.

Extensive as this symposium is, and comprising the ideas of so many writers, it is well worthy of being read and judicially studied by every person interested in the welfare of Spiritualism.

The careful reader will find these essays sparkling with bright gems of thought, and in the variant views all will find somewhat that will commend itself to their minds; and, of course, somewhat that will not accord with their individual tastes and intellectual preferences.

Where the views and opinions expressed are such as we dissent from, we may still receive benefit by the exercise of a kindly feeling of toleration, remembering that these writers all, with all their divergences of views, are Spiritualists still, to be held and esteemed as such in all our thought concerning them and their opinions.

We can all rejoice and be glad that in Spiritualism there is no Pope to fulminate bulls of excommunication against heretics in thought and opinion; and no inquisitorial authorities to place on an Index Expurgatorius a ban against published heretical utterances.

In Spiritualism freedom of thought reaches its highest culmination, its most perfect flower and fruitage.

In the full exercise of this mental freedom lies the pathway of discovery and acceptance of all truth, and the overthrow and elimination of error. Thought is free to soar to sublimest heights, and wing its way to farthest outreaches of mightiest intellect, with none in earth or in the higher spheres to hinder its flight or progress. Such is the freedom of Spiritualism. And our Symposium in its degree is the reflection of this freedom.

We doubt not that many of our readers will find the perusal of these views mentally exhilarating and educational; and many will feel that they are spiritually quickened, enlivened and benefited by the thoughts expressed.

For these and other reasons The Progressive Thinker feels that it is doing a good work in sending forth its symposium to the world.

President H. D. Barrett

We were pained to learn that President Barrett had been suddenly called home to Boston last week from his western trip, on account of the dangerous sickness of his wife. There now seems to be strong hopes that she may ultimately recover.

Crowded Out.

All items are crowded out this week to give place to the Symposium. It will be continued next week. The varied thoughts presented are interesting and suggestive, and will do great good.

A. J. DAVIS.

A Lucid Explanation of the Arabula Chapter.

Mr. Davis sends us the following in explanation of the Arabula chapter, published last week. It is a preface to the second edition of Arabula, and also a note in the sixth edition:

Judging from the variety and spirit of criticisms received since the publication of the first edition, I am constrained to conclude that, in many thoughtful minds, not only has the purport of the chapter entitled "God Revealed to the Intellect," been thoroughly misunderstood and unappreciated, but that the explanations and definitions of the impersonal "Arabula" have also been sadly neglected and uncomprehended as to their bearing upon the value and object of the Argument. I have already said (see page 207 of this volume) that the chief object in introducing the Argument (which was first published anonymously, and so placed beyond all ordinary means of knowing by whom or how it was written) was, to illustrate the best throes of Intellect in its ambitious exertions to fathom for its own satisfaction the "light" which invariably comes silently and without argument to the awakened Intuition. [see Gt. Har., Vol. II. p. 268.] Students of the Harmonial Philosophy fully understand, and hence do not continually need to be reminded, that Intellect is to pure Reason exactly what Instinct is to Intuition. Intellect, per se, is selfishness embodied—self-assertive, proud, conceited, pompous and self-sufficient, positive and dogmatic. Its arguments and its revealings of God must necessarily correspond to its own natural laws and tendencies. Hence the conception and statement of God, which the limited and logical Intellect can possibly unfold, will of necessity be a God of personal limitations—cold, proud, judicial, majestic, jealous, wilful, and changeable under sufficient inducement. It was not designed that the Argument of the chapter, beginning, on page 208, should be regarded as final, but merely as representative of what the atheistic Intellect is capable of discovering Godward, and in its own behalf, or for its own temporary satisfaction, independently of Intuition and the revealings of Arabula. Therefore the severity of the dogmatic denunciations of opposing views must be charged to the nature of the positive Intellect, and should not be remembered against the author, who still refers to Gt. Har., Vol. II., and to parts of his other Volumes, for his own perceptions and Harmonial reasonings concerning the nature, existence and government of Deity.

Note to the Sixth Edition.—Since the foregoing was written a friend has been successful in his search for the author of the chapter on "God," Mr. H. Farrington, a member of the legal profession; but why he should have concealed his name from the original publication is not explained. Within it is an "inspiration," which, according to my mental experience, was what led me to discover its existence and value.

A Brother in Affliction.

Dr. Geo. B. Warne writes: The burdens of supreme trial and affliction just now rest with great weight upon Robert Grabe, of 841 59th street, Chicago. He is the pastor of the Truthseekers' Society of Spiritualists, at the corner of 59th and Halsted streets. Scarlet fever recently broke out in his family. On Friday, the 7th inst., he buried a son eighteen years old, who had been working at the same bench with his father in the Englewood Sash and Door Factory. Four more of the children are down with the remorseless disease, one of them a daughter of seven years, being in a very critical condition. Two more of his children at home have not yet come down with the contagion, but may do so at any hour. Here is an excellent opportunity to express a little practical fraternal sympathy. I hear of one or two mediums, who, feeling they cannot contribute financial assistance directly, are arranging benefit circles for our brother. However, do not claim credit for doing a charity if you attend such a circle, and get a one-dollar reading by the payment of only ten cents. Give for a worthy cause independent of any return to yourself. Are we not asking much more gratuitous work of our Chicago mediums than we are willing to do ourselves? Just how much physical, mental and psychical drafting is ten cents sufficient return for? Mediums, no matter if classed like Chicago's drinking water, as suspicious, usable or good, are seldom found wanting in fraternal generosity. William Lynn, a brother medium, has aided Brother Grabe in the exacting work of nursing his stricken flock, for Mrs. Grabe has been a partial invalid in these dark hours.

SPIRITUALISM.

Its Proper Place the Domain of Science.

If Spiritualism can be made to stand as a religious sect, cult, or movement, and be classed as one of the various religious organizations, as seems to be the thought of some of our speakers who say "Spiritualism and other nenominations," as if we were one of them it will in my judgment utterly fail of being, as was expected by its early advocates, the great reformatory force that would bring peace and a condition of universal brotherhood to mankind.

The view-point of those who would make of it another religious sect, with its prayers, ordinations, christenings, pastors, licensed mediums, services and churches, seems to me narrow and unworthy.

Why should the discovery of the law of communication with those who have passed into a realm of finer substance, with more rapid vibrations, be made the basis of a sect, any more than the discovery of wireless telegraphy, or of telepathy, or any other natural law?

If Spiritualism teaches anything, it is the simple fact that life is continuous and progressive, and that the mission of earth life is to grow naturally through the normal exercise of every function of body and spirit, striving to help each other to make of this world a fit place in which to live. That liberty to think, speak and act according to our best judgment, should be the inalienable right of each and all, without fear or favor.

Sectarianizing Spiritualism, putting tags on its workers, founding churches, adopting a creed, with orthodox hymns and "long prayers in public places to be seen of men," which was condemned by the reformer of Nazareth, who said "when you pray, enter your closet and shut the door, and pray in secret." This backward movement in Spiritualism has done far more to drive from our ranks thinkers and scholars than have fraudulent mediums.

Our work, as I understand it, is to help humanity in every possible way, not Spiritualists alone, and I have no more interest in the welfare and happiness of a Spiritualist than any other human being. "Give to each according to his need," not according to his belief.

We need no Spiritualist schools, for if our school system is defective, as all our institutions are, let us work to improve them. If our rostrums are occupied at times by illiterate speakers who use bad English, we need not rush to establish sectarian schools on that account, for sure our free school system teaches grammar.

We need in our present state of civilization homes for the aged and helpless, not sectarian but humanitarian, where no question of belief is asked of the applicant. We have some such now, and on how much grander principles founded than are Jewish homes, Methodist homes or Spiritualist homes.

I believe in universal life, liberty and fraternity, but as long as we believe in and bow before a supreme ruler of the universe we will continue the ridiculous farce of sending envoys to bow before the ruler of a kingdom, instead of emphasizing individual sovereignty.

When we maintain that reason, and not revelation either ancient or modern, should control mankind; when we go for messages from those on the other side with the same feelings that we would have in going to a telegraph office to communicate with those in other localities; when we cease having little children or ignorant people as "our guides" or "controls," and are as particular in regard to our associates decarnate as those in the flesh, we will have done away with much nonsense, and establish Spiritualism on the basis of science and reason, which are its facts and philosophy and learn that the highest happiness comes from greatest service to humanity.

RELIGION OR SCIENCE.

Would Rise Above All Limitations of Old Superstitions.

The questions you put to your correspondents are certainly relevant to the principle underlying Spiritualism, and yet the subject is not new either as a text for general discussion in the columns of your paper or for me to write upon, and it seems hard to tread except upon a well trodden path; however, as the inspiration comes I seem to gather a few thoughts upon the question, "Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?"

If religion is to remain in our vocabulary as meaning the worship of a God, Spiritualism would be very much out of place "among the great religions of the world."

If religion implies all or any of the old forms and ceremonies, superstitions and creeds, Spiritualism would be living under an assumed name to be called a religion.

In order to raise Spiritualism up out of the blind folly of the dead past; in order to lead the investigative minds of the present youth and all coming generations away from the "straight and narrow path" of ignorance and mental slavery, into the broad and winding paths of truth and wisdom, I would relegate all the useless, silly forms and ceremonies of past religions, abolish the invoking of an imaginary deity, and cease imitating these ancient methods we consider only used to organize the ignorant, common people into bands of laborers for the upbuilding of a "great cause" whose real foundation lies in the scheme of priests, clergymen and other financiers, to extort money.

If ours is a reformatory movement, let us make it such in fact as well as in theory. Let us abolish from our truth and from our cause all ceremonies, from our teachings and our actions all that would indicate to the rising generation that ours as an institution is but a relic, a mere track in the mire of old superstition, an offshoot from Old Theology.

That it is demonstrable as a science Prof. Lockwood can prove with his various devices and very scientific lectures; by Prof. Loveland, J. Clegg Wright, Lyman C. Howe, Chas. Dawbarn and many others through actual philosophy. Our inspirational speakers produce logic that is incontrovertible, and Our Moses proves—not that Spiritualism is a religion, but that there is no religion that is not spiritual, and that Spiritualism is older than all the rest; that without the communications with the angel world first there never was a foundation for a religion, though at that remote period of undevelopment, the bible age, the gate of superstition was the only entrance.

Then we have our mediums, the instruments upon whose sensitive organisms vibrate the force of spirit to produce the phenomena in all its forms of manifestation, mental, psychical and physical. These are our demonstrations to prove all this philosophy.

Science deals with facts. Here are our facts.

Religion deals with God. Where is the God?

It is high time we were drifting away from the ideal into the real. It is time we were discarding the priestly robes of deception and darkness, and wearing the garb of modern progress and light, building homes instead of churches; instituting harmonial resorts and beautiful abiding places for the aged and infirm instead of creeds and prayer meetings.

If, however, I should ask Shakspeare this question he would answer back from his present sphere: "What's in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

Were I to consult the spirit of Thos. Paine, no doubt these words would echo back: "To do good is my religion."

Abraham Lincoln would doubtless say, "It matters not so the shackles fall from the human slaves."

Ingersoll would reply: "An honest God is the noblest work of man, but superstition is dangerous; beware!"

Our E. V. Wilson would quickly reply: "Raise the standard of the church, but do not lower the standard of Spiritualism."

Our dear old friend, M. P. Rosecrans, the sarcastic author of "Snowball's Sermons," and other splendid articles that used to occur in The Progressive Thinker, would say: "Tell our good people to keep off the grass."

To those who have passed on beyond the narrow confines of the flesh and into the larger world of soul, these little bickerings; these petty differences of mere opinion as to what shall be the path into which Spiritualism will drift, must seem insignificant, as do all our troubles and trials when once overcome and they glide with the dead past.

Let us care not what they call it, nor split up upon a name,
Whether science or religion, or if both,
'tis all the same;
It has opened up the future to a blinded mortal man,
And is neither owned or mortgaged to a trust or hoggish clan.
True, it looms above religion and gives science better light,
And will some day lift all peoples from the dark and gloomy night.
It has paralyzed the devil and put out his glowing fire;
It has palsied superstition and has raised religion higher;
It has soothed the grieving mortals by subduing needless fear
For the loved ones and has proven that their spirits hover near.
It encompasses all science and religion on the earth,
And new impetus to wisdom was begotten at its birth,
Hence it stands up with creation and Dame Nature's mighty law,
And will never find a lodgment in a narrow creedal maw.
'Tis a principle and power that can never lag behind,
Or be narrowed to religion or to science for mankind;
But will soar just like an eagle in his kingdom of the air,
In the spheres of all the future and be ruler everywhere,
Not as king or pope or emperor upon a
tyrant's throne,
But in justice true and equal in the universe—its own.
Let those who wish to linger with a pet religion come,
Bring on their dear old Bible and their ancient creedal crumb,
And we'll let them do their praying to just any God they please,
And as often, and while standing, or upon their bended knees.
They can build their little churches, and can have a dummy creed,
And can worship round an altar if their spirits feel the need.
But the length and depth and broadness of our grand and sacred cause,
With her white wings of protection, and the truth grasped in her claws,
Will admit them to her bosom in a welcome sort of way,
And will teach them all of spirit and a bright eternal day.

IDEAL RELIGION.

The Beautiful Flower and Fruitage of Science.

If there is that in Spiritualism which induces spiritual aspiration toward high ideals in purity of thought and life, and so tends to upliftment to higher planes of spirituality, it is in so far, to my mind, religious, if not a religion.

In this sense Spiritualism embraces within itself the really essential principle of all religions, and is, in fact the one and only catholic (universal) religion.

Spiritualism grounds its outward proofs and factors in science; it establishes itself objectively on the basis of demonstrative scientific evidences, and not on mythic miracles or faith.

But while its roots are imbedded in the rich soil of philosophy and science, its flower and fruitage have the aroma of the spiritual, the finer excellences of ideal perfection.

Spiritualism without this spiritual flower and fruitage is a barren tree whose roots spread far and wide, but it does not reach its full development and culmination in the ripe perfected fruit that is the natural expression of its life and being.

There is naught unnatural or supernatural in this outworking of the spiritual nature of man.

But while its feet, so to say, are planted on the firm foundation of science, its head is amid the starry heavens of ideal spiritual truths that call forth the soul's loving admiration, adoration, and aspiration, and this is religion, in its highest and purest sense and expression.

In this higher realm of spiritual love and adoration the soaring soul is attracted by the exceeding transcendent beauty of the spiritual ideals on which it gazes with enraptured vision.

The beauty and excellence beheld binds and rebinds the soul with the strong cords of loving attraction to the pure spiritual ideals on which its vision rests.

This spiritual religion is of such high nature and such ever-expansive quality, it cannot be "cribbed, cabined and confined" in the limiting trammels of a petrified creedal statement. It makes for eternal growth and progression.

If one crystallizes all of one's purest and best ideals of excellence and goodness, and mentally embodies them in a being or personality; or, if it be helpful to a soul to apply all ideal beauties, excellences and goodness to an impersonal Divine Being, God or Infinite Intelligence, of whom or which these are attributes; and if one feels to worship this Being either as a personal or as impersonal, it does not become the function of any other to say "nay" to such worship and adoration.

Nor, is it the function of any one, or any number of persons, to declare what any one other than themselves individually does or does not believe.

Truth in its broad sense is one and the same forever; but men's knowledge and perception of truth are ever-expansive, and no attempt to confine the mind's outlook and outreach should be allowed in any degree to hamper or circumscribe perfect freedom of thought, or hinder progress in the attainment of clearest knowledge and most advanced of the ever-advancing perceptions of spiritual truth, or clog the perfective trend of the soul toward ever-advancing spiritual ideals.

Science, too, is eternal in its scope and development, with its fruitage in the upbuilding of the spiritual life.

Such are my thoughts at the present time, not given as a law unto other minds; and they are subject to change or modification, in my own mind, as further thought and spiritual growth may indicate.

Further, let it be understood that the realm of operation, the function of ideals pertains not exclusively to the future state of spirit existence, but bears as well on this present life and its environments and conditions. Such religion is for the now as well as the hereafter.

It may be observed that I do not confine myself to the dictionary definitions of religion. I claim the right to do this, because the great encyclopedias, and even Christian writers and speakers, freely mention Confucianism and Buddhism as religions, although neither of these systems has any reference to a God or His worship.

A RELIGION OR A TRUTH?

To Each According to His Development.

Religion is a system of faith and worship, Spiritualism is the demonstration, through psychic phenomena, of man's continued existence after physical death. Man is a religious being or not, according to the development of his veneration and spirituality; he may be a Spiritualist and religionist, or devoid of the religious element.

We hear Spiritualists say "Spiritualism is my religion," which means, does it not, that they believe in the truths of Spiritualism and really have no religion. Other Spiritualists, being fully developed in the region of veneration and spirituality, naturally deliver invocations and follow in the lines of those religionists who base their religion entirely upon faith, not accepting the demonstrated truth of Spiritualism. If these propositions be true, then how can a mere belief in a continued existence, through Spiritualism, equip one as a religionist, or in other words, how can Spiritualism be a religion?

This does not necessarily bar organization, for through organization we are able to more systematically present the evidence of this important truth to the world. That it is of great importance none will deny, and many people have given more or less of their life service to its presentation. There is no measuring the value of the life work of such psychics as Lyman C. Howe, or the importance of the phenomena received through P. L. O. A. Keeler, the Bangs Sisters and many others. We have an organization in the C. L. F. A. that is second to none in the world, in the importance of the work that has been accomplished along these lines, and yet we do not call it a religious institution, it is a corporate body organized for religious, scientific and educational purposes.

Hundreds have been convinced of the truth of Spiritualism, and thousands have broadened out and are wiser and better for having visited our camp; yet each individual, accepting the truth, appropriates it according to his or her development.

To one it may be a religion, to another a scientific truth, while to another it brings them in touch with their departed loved ones; each and all being benefited in their own way.

PURE RELIGION.

Shall We Have a Religion, or a Science?

It depends altogether upon your concept of religion and science. There are certain pseudo-scientists in the ranks of Spiritualism to whom the name of either religion or God is like a red rag flaunted in the face of an angry bull. These people, having picked up a smattering of the positivism of Comte and Frederic Harrison, of the crass materialism of Tyndall and Haeckel, and the monadistic theories of Paul Carus, and having borrowed the ponderous terminology of Spencer and a certain school of pseudo-psychologists, are beating frantically on their tin pan of Atheism, vainly endeavoring to drown out the sound of the mighty diapason of spiritual harmony that is pealing over the world from the organ of Eternal Truth.

These men and women are quibbling over the Latin derivation of the word religion and are loud in their iteration of the premise that because they have never been able to comprehend, or to feel the psychic impulse that tells of the existence of immortality, of conscious life of the ego after the chemical change called death, and of an infinite intelligence, therefore these things do not exist. This is their method of reasoning, that because they per se have never seen nor heard, therefore, what they have never heard, nor seen, nor felt, does not exist.

No man can think of the non-existent. It is a psychological impossibility to formulate a concept of a non-existence power or substance. We may be mistaken in our concept, and misread the form and attributes of the causative energy of the universe, but that energy will calmly keep on its way, existing and evolving new forms and manifesting new expressions of its powers. This is an axiom that cannot be denied, and upon this we are willing to rest our case as to the scientific basis of an infinite intelligence.

However, we are not concerned with the derivation of the word religion, nor with the orthodox theological concept thereof; but rather we are concerned with the practical everyday application of the words of an inspired Hebrew in the days of old, when he said: "Pure religion and undefiled with the God and Father is this—to take the oversight of orphans and widows in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world."—James 1:27—Emphatic Diaglot, by Benj. Wilson—from Griesbach's rescension of Vatican MSS 1209.

Such a practical direction of our talents does not need a lengthy ceremonial and cumbersome creed to express it or to attract the people to it, yet under the simplest form of organized activity we may give to it, it will be a practical religion and it will be genuine Spiritualism, applied and not theorized. In other words it seems to us that Spiritualism is both a religion and a science. It contains all there is of the science of right living and all there is of the philosophy of the life after death that is capable of demonstration in the present development of man's ego.

Science is applied truth. Religion is applied truth. Spiritualism is applied truth. Therefore Spiritualism equals Science and Science equals Religion and Spiritualism equals both Science and Religion, for quantities that are equal to the same thing are equal to each other.

The secret of success in all practical reforms is organization, and every organization should possess a declaration of principles, and a simple ceremonial of receiving members and providing for the recognition of its workers and members; and the forms that appeal most strongly to the great masses of the people are religious in their nature, and these will attract the people we most desire to reach.

The natural tendency of the human ego is to express itself in reverence and love for the beautiful and for the mysterious; but the advance of the human ego, while banishing the elements of superstition and so-called supernaturalism, and substituting therefor a science of naturalism, has not banished the element of reverence and love for truth and beauty, and this is the religion we would have; a religion and science of right living, of broad charity for all and toleration for those who may happen to differ from us.

The great need of Spiritualism is not a new formula of belief, but rather a crystallization of our present formulae into practical form, and the placing of our phenomena upon a scientific basis and a practical application of the Science and Religion of Spiritualism as expressed in the works of Mrs. Richmond, Prof. Denton, Prof. Brittan, Prof. Hare, Prof. Wallace, a Crookes, a Zollner, a Moses Hull, a Mrs. Lillie, a Mrs. Warner-Bishop, an Edmonds, a Davis, a Howe, a Dean Clarke, a Mrs. Longley, Abby Judson, and a thousand and one others who have stood on the frontiers of the new thought and fought the battles of Truth.

Let us by all means have a scientific religion, of wisdom, beauty, and strength based upon the principles of eternal love and purity.

The cry made by the pseudo-materialists and sciolists of our ranks against religion is misplaced and no one need be alarmed over their false alarm of waning Spiritualism because we have raised the standard of an organized army with a settled policy of education, and elimination of the crudities and frauds. On the other hand we have cause for rejoicing that we are returning to the standard of the '50's and '60's, when our rostrum was supplied with thinkers and workers, before the days of commercialism and self-exploitation.

The religion and science of Spiritualism are inseparable and we shall conquer under that standard and no other. The battle can never be won by guerrilla warfare and materialistic atheism, miscalled naturalism. Let us by all means have religion and science both.

HENRY H. WARNER.

THE RACE'S LIBERATOR.

Where Shall Spiritualism Stand?

Spiritualism is a readjustment of the entire thought of life, its purpose and methods. It can not take its place with religions as a religion exclusive, for it is so much more than that term means.

Religions have dealt with the question of immortality and man's relation with the great mysterious cause of things.

They have confined themselves to speculative theories and lines of reasoning always ignoring facts when they contradicted previous opinions. They have believed in death, and been ever teaching men how to get ready for that event.

While Spiritualism teaches and proves the fact of immortality, and has unlocked the mystery surrounding some of the causes of things, and teaches a broader concept of morals and ethics, thus leading into the realm of hope, suggestion and emotion. But it does much more than this. Nor do I feel it can be exclusively placed with the sciences of to-day; for they have been and still are very bigoted.

Science thus far deals only with three dimensions of space, ignoring all that suggests in any way or proves there are more that hitherto have been unknown to man. Spiritualism proves as it does immortality that there is a fourth dimension, and in this are the causes of what we see revealed in these three. Spiritualism has a scientific demonstrative side, that answers and suggests to man continually. But it does not ignore the emotional and ethical side of life as science does. Therefore it is more complete than any science. So could not remain exclusively in this class.

Spiritualism in its most intelligent analysis and useful application to the race is a philosophy of life, based upon scientific knowledge. And is so far-reaching in its power, it encompasses all religions, all sciences and reforms of the day. When intelligently interpreted and used it will fill every need of man. It belongs to no previous sect or class, but to the front guard of progression's army. Not a scientific religion or religious science, for there can be no such thing in the realm of common sense, but a philosophy of life that can prove all its suggestions when given time and opportunity. It is the greatest liberator the race has ever known.

With Phillips Brooks I would define liberty, "The opportunity to live our highest." This Spiritualism gives.

Frank McKinley.

Frank McKinley, of Sandusky, Ohio, was in the city last week. We are glad to know that Mr. McKinley invites honest skeptics to his seances. He would take special delight in convincing Mr. Mangasarian, the noted lecturer of this city, that spirits can and do communicate with mortals. Then he would like to tackle the distinguished divine Stanley L. Krebs, of Greensburg, Pa. Mr. McKinley's reputation as a medium has never been questioned. All honest skeptics who have been pushed back in their investigations by various mediums, are most cordially invited to visit Mr. McKinley. He is a trumpet medium; manifestations in the light and dark.

Mr. McKinley is a wholesome, good natured gentleman, and is always ready to meet distinguished skeptics.

Condensed Thought.

Through Spiritualism we have a realization of immortality; a fact made known through medial instruments. The duty of science is to record this fact, and place it before the world, as a truth found out, and well attested, and it should be set forth in all our school books.

A GREAT PRIMAL TRUTH.

Views of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond.

"Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?"

Agreeably to your polite invitation to send you my views concerning the above question, I take great pleasure in submitting the following as a brief summary of what I consider to be the true position of Spiritualism.

Spiritualism is a great primal truth. The fact of spirit communion may or may not exist in any given age of the world's history, but that would not change the truth concerning man's spiritual nature. Many people mistake facts for truths and thereby narrow down the most exalted propositions concerning the universe.

In every age there have been those endowed with the gift—or gifts of spiritual perception, "spiritual gifts"—and these gifts have constituted the facts by which the minds of earth have been made aware of the truths of the spiritual realms.

Religion is a primal factor in the nature of Humanity; the result of spiritual perception. A creed or dogma is something formulated upon human beliefs and may change with every century or year.

As we find the same great spiritual truths at the foundation of all religious systems, we know that differences in creeds are but the result of the various limitations in the human minds who formulate them—in fact are the broken and clouded fragments of the pure white light of Spiritual Truth.

To mistake creed or dogma for religion is as fallacious as to mistake fact for truth.

As the demonstration of a thing is not the thing itself, so the means by which man becomes aware of a truth cannot constitute that truth.

Spiritualism is the modern name for the means by which a large number of human beings become aware of the continued existence of the personal spirit of man beyond the change called death; the various facts of the phenomena forming for many minds the only evidence of a future state; but unless those facts can be classified and the method of their production formulated it will be difficult for the student of science to study them from a purely scientific standpoint. But even if this were found possible, the great truths of immortality, of intercommunion between different states of existence by spiritual intelligences, by spiritual methods alone, would not be touched.

As language is the means by which ideas may be communicated, so are the various methods of spirit communion the means of conveying what those human intelligences who have passed to another state of existence wish or may be able to say to mortals. One must not mistake language for ideas.

The methods of those communications may prove to be an interesting study, when the human mind becomes sufficiently illumined to be capable of pursuing such a study, but the most important thing in connection with Spiritualism is the message.

All the subtle analyses of all the scientists concerning the method of its transmission cannot touch the realm from which the message comes and the realm into which it comes, when one long thought dead sends by any method whatever the thrilling statement, "I live and love you still."

The aggregate of that message and the realm of spiritual truth into which it leads is the message of Spiritualism.

So all-inclusive is this proposition that I very much doubt if there is a realm of human inquiry to which it does not lead. As all roads led to Rome so do all subjects of human thought and action derive their value from the knowledge that the message is true.

If science has ventured any previous theories concerning the future life of the personal human spirit, those theories must bend to the universal truth. If creeds and dogmas have barred the door to a knowledge of the future life, they must yield to that which the knowledge brings; if false theories concerning the true ethics of human beings in their relations to each other have prevailed, those theories must disappear with the real knowledge of the effect of human ignorance and wrong-doing on the spirit of man here and hereafter.

The basis of life is changed from the material and transient to the real and eternal.

To attempt to make a religious system of Spiritualism in competition with "other great religions" would, in my opinion, belittle the religion of Spiritualism.

Spiritualism is to me, and I think to many, the spirit of all religions; accepted as religion it is not a religion, but the flowering out of religion. Yet it must be to every one and to all what they make it, or what they find in it adapted to their needs.

On the other hand, those who would call it science, might better use the term, The final solution of all Sciences; for the facts of Spiritualism really wipe out the former scientific bases—all of them—and compel a reconstruction of the primal propositions of physicists; but in the opinion of the writer, science deals with the body of which Spiritualism is the spirit—nay, in its highest interpretation it is the soul.

Perhaps the word "philosophy" might be more acceptable to many than either "science" or "religion;" the terms that we use do not so much signify as that we express what we really mean; but this is evident: unless Spiritualists grasp the full meaning of the vast sources of thought and truth into which they have been invited and admitted by the messengers of the higher realms, they will lose the grand opportunity of uniting the body of the universe with the soul; of uniting the student of material science with the student of spiritual truth.

We are all too prone to dispute about terms and words; often finding that we mean the same thing.

The higher affections are involved in the revealments of Spiritualism, and it is very difficult to make mankind believe that the messages that prove the eternity of those affections are to be classified under the general name of "science."

That there is a value in the so-called "scientific" investigation of the Psychical Research and other societies one must admit; but the value is chiefly because of the influence of the "scientist" over other minds in inducing others to investigate, or at least to heed those evidences already received. The "facts" reported by learned Professors as having been witnessed by them are no more conclusive, no more remarkable, than those witnessed by thousands who lay no claim to the name of "scientist."

Out of all the facts and teachings of fifty-five years, the great body of Spiritualists ought to be able to formulate a statement, broad, nonsectarian, and conclusive, of what Spiritualism has brought to them.

If the same truths are to be found in any ancient book, church, philosophy or system of thought, that fact should not militate against the truth, since we know that "there is nothing new under the sun; not even the revealments of Modern Spiritualism.

To unite for spiritual instruction and worship, or for any worthy purpose, is the inevitable right and duty of all who seek to present the light and truth they have received that others may be benefited thereby. As "union is strength," provided there is real union, so I think Spiritualists may unite on the basis of spiritual truth, agreeing as to what they know, tolerant where they differ, and whether under the name of religion or some other name, bearing forward the standard fearlessly of a higher and more divine humanity.

To the one writing this the great spiritual outpourings of the ages are in answer to the spiritual needs of humanity; are a summons to return ever to the sources of true knowledge; are the essential answer to the essential religious needs of the people.

This spirit of religion is what the "movement," on the human side, has lacked, and what it still needs. When Spiritualists cease to be afraid of a name or term and unite to present the truth and serve mankind, they will not mistake the great spirit of religion for the petty creeds and narrow bigotry existing in its name. Religion; Freedom; Love; what wrongs have been perpetrated in these names! Yet again and again the angelic messengers will bear to the world the "glad tidings" of great joy" conveyed in the true meaning of those blessed words. Let us have religion; not a religion, but that divine spirit of true praise and fellowship that will show how beautiful in this as in every age are the feet of them "that bring glad tidings" when they work with one accord.

CORA L. V. RICHMOND.

A PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE.

Is Spiritualism a Science or a Religion?

The brevity of this reply will necessitate the use of dogmatic assertions, with neither argument nor illustration, a necessity for which I am sorry.

In my opinion, Spiritualism is neither a religion nor a science. It is not a science for the reason that it is infinitely more. To designate it as a science, is to place it in the category with astronomy, chemistry, biology, psychology, etc.; which is a serious mistake—a mistake which doubtless arises from confounding Spiritualism with psychic science. Psychic science belongs in this category of sciences, and is one of the foundation stones, the corner-stone in fact, of Spiritualism; but it no more constitutes the philosophy of Spiritualism than geology constitutes the theory of evolution.

The sciences, one and all, are the foundation upon which the superstructure of Spiritualism is built. Science is nothing more nor less than classified knowledge. The highest generalizations of science are the basis of philosophy. Spiritualism is a philosophy, elaborated from and resting upon these high and broad generalizations, drawn from all departments of human knowledge, but more especially from those which relate to man as a moral, social and spiritual being. It is a philosophy of life, based upon demonstrated truths concerning the powers, capacities and susceptibilities of the human spirit. It deals with the evolution and unfoldment both of the individual and of society. It is the expression of the sum of man's knowledge concerning man.

Now, what is religion? "The recognition of God as an object of worship, love and obedience." But what has this to do with Spiritualism? Let us draw some contrasts. For the worship of God, Spiritualism substitutes the study of natural law; for speculations concerning the relation between God and man, investigation of the true relation between man and his brother man; for the study of theology, the study of ethics; for the study of the attributes of God, the study of the possibilities in man; for faith, facts; for belief, knowledge; for supernaturalism, science; for love and praise to God, love and service to humanity; for piety, spirituality; for priestcraft, pure and exalted mediumship; for prayers and supplications, the co-operation of the angel world; for the glorification of God, the spiritualization of man—in short, for Deity, Humanity.

Take God out of religion and there is nothing left. Take God out of Spiritualism, and the whole structure of its philosophy remains intact. Its firm scientific basis, its lofty ethics, its pure aspirations, its radiant hope, all its grand and inspiring truths remain unchanged.

I cannot see that the question of a supreme power bears any relation whatever to the philosophy of Spiritualism. It is quite another and separate matter, one which each individual must settle according to his own convictions, irrespective of his Spiritualistic views. The question of "Infinite Intelligence," instead of being a vital factor in Spiritualism, is no factor at all. It can be eliminated without affecting the value of the equation. It is the letter X of unknown quantity which appears in every term. Leave it in or leave it out, it matters not. The solution remains the same. Some of our loftiest and purest minds prefer the X. Let them have it. Others, equally lofty, equally pure, prefer to leave it out. So be it. What matters it, so long as the problem of life is rightly solved by us all? Brothers and sisters let us not quarrel.

If some Spiritualists prefer to add religion to their view of things, let them do so. That is their privilege. But Spiritualism is not a religion, and should not be understood nor taught as such.

For myself, I have no liking for the terms God, religion or prayer; and never use them in expressing anything that is grand or beautiful or dear to me. They savor too much of superstition, ignorance, bigotry, intolerance, persecution, hypocrisy, and crimes and cruelty unspeakable. Instead of the term God, I prefer the words Eternal Law; instead of religion, philosophy or ethics; instead of prayer, aspiration.

Spiritualism comes clad in the white raiment of truth, not in the blood-stained garments of superstition. It has no record of which to be ashamed. There are no dark crimes in its history. It has waged no war of extermination. It has placed no victim upon the rack, nor in the dungeon. It has not persecuted nor tortured, nor burned at the stake. And for my part, I dislike to see it placed before the world clad in the verbiage of a religious organization which has been guilty of these monstrous and numberless crimes.

SCIENCE, OR RELIGION?

It Cannot Be Confined to Either.

To the Editor:—You ask whether Spiritualism should become a foundation of a religion, or whether it should be assigned to the domain of science, the same as any other scientific fact? On reading, the impulse is to answer—neither.

Religion, per se, is superstition. The message of Modern Spiritualism is to do away with superstition. It does this by substituting fact for belief. That is all there is to it.

A fact is not religious, nor is it scientific. A knowledge of the fact may be science, and a religion or a philosophy may be based on it—but the fact itself is not affected. Religion is a congeries of mental or imaginary ideals built upon assumed conditions, without reference to nature. Science is simply the recognition of a demonstrated thing in nature. Nature is the objective universe—for the purpose of the inquiry, our world—earth and atmosphere. It is this because all beyond is speculative, guess work. To the fish the water is the world; to the animal, the water and the land; to the bird, water, land and the air.

Now, Spiritualism cannot be a religion, because it has a fact for its foundation. It cannot be a science, because its basic fact transcends objective nature—the domain with which alone science deals. So it cannot be confined to either.

Religion in reality, is merely hypothetical. Although lexicographers call it a noun, yet it is more courteous than correct—it is not really "a thing"—but possibly so accepted because it can be anything.

A great deal of vague thinking and loose talk is indulged as to science. It is simply "knowledge of facts or principles." But the causes behind the facts are not embraced—these become hypotheses. Certain phenomena were observed and by great research ascertained to be constant in regard to the relative positions of our earth and the stars, so that certain events—as an eclipse—could be predicted to a moment of time. This fact, or these facts so ascertained, became the science of astronomy. So the structure and functions of the human body observed and studied for centuries has resulted in the modern science of physiology and surgery. But how suns and planets came and how maintained, or what or how the human being was or is, all is mystery and a closed secret, as yet.

Now, it can be seen why Spiritualism cannot be a superstition, as is religion, because based on a fact—the demonstrated continuity of individualized life. Nr is it a fact in science, because the being it demonstrates to exist after the body is dead is not in the field of science—science in other words belongs to the material. A scientist is a physicist, he cannot be a seer. Nothing can be experimentally known of spirit through the laboratory of the scientist, and all science is from experiment and experience.

The better statement would be that knowledge as to Spiritualism should be pursued after the scientific method. That method seeks facts through evidence and demonstration. When a fact is established it controls the methods of farther research, but ceases to be a subject of debate. It becomes a basis, an element in itself. A scientific fact is rather a misnomer. The scientific method has ascertained the fact, not made it.

But you may ask: What then? If neither a religion nor a science, what are we to do? Just as you do with any other fact. The solar system is not a religious condition, nor is it a science. It is a fact upon which both religion and science base theories and hypotheses, but the sun, moon and planets are not affected by either. The circulation of the blood is a fact religion never recognized, though its shedding is its most vital dogma, and it took science a long time to get rid of blood-letting and find out the truth. The suspension of the visceral functions ends all that religion knows about the soul, and these functions must be restored by a miraculous blow from the celestial trumpeter before it, the soul, can be handled in the saving or otherwise. Nor has science yet sounded the mysteries of the viscera farther than castor oil or the knife may have helped its explorations.

So with the facts of Spiritualism. They are there. The few demonstrated give rise to theories almost as varied as the beliefs in religion. But they are the best thinking each can do from the common facts, colored as all must be by early and traditional education. He is an insufferable egotist who sets up to teach his conclusions to you or me as the truth. Let each think as best each can, and all stand by the facts demonstrated to all.

Spiritualists, as a rule, will not stand dictation from any individual or body of individuals as to what they may think or do. The acceptors of Spiritualism were convinced by its phenomena through mediumship, and no priest or professor con come between them and the evidences. Religionists and scientists may demoralize and corrupt. They may be destructionists—never constructionists.

SAR'GIS.

An Important Question.

Your question importunes me to say science, without further consideration. But I know the value of propaganda before the world, and therefore would not assume to be radical in the measure taken. But I would advocate a scientific basis to it and prove the moral in that at all times and under all circumstances, thus showing that morality per se is a science.

It has been sufficiently illustrated that prejudice vitiates the blood by generating an acid that produces disease. Now, prejudice is an emotion of the human soul opposed by all religions as a degenerating principle, but giving no scientific reason, however, for its being so.

"Thus saith the Lord" does not meet the requirements of modern investigators. A scientific reason must accompany moral suasion to reach a very large per centage of thinkers.

Spiritualism as the latest revelation, therefore, must fill this desideratum; and rightly understood, it can and does.

The proper study of mankind is man. Spiritualism hyphenates man with nature, and he who follows the course direct will reach a scientific foundation that is superior to anything yet revealed. All emotions, like the aforenamed, can then be analyzed and found to have as much bearing on his material as on his spiritual nature.

Religion may serve as a bodyguard for truth, but it should not be made its soul. Nature furnishes the soul of man; let it furnish the soul for his religion. He will then find that Spiritualism, like morality, is a science, pure and simple.

DEEP SPIRITUAL TRUTH.

Geo. H. Brooks' Answer to the Important Question.

Your circular received. It opens a wide field of thought, and I do not know as I can make myself thoroughly understood, in my reply.

To me, if Spiritualism is to be turned over to the purely scientific phase of investigation, in which only those of scientific development are to give to the waiting world what has been revealed to them, just as the Psychical Research Society, whose members consist of scientists, judges, statesmen college professors, and ministers, give to the world their investigations, and who, after a long research, try to explain away the phenomena as not of a spiritual origin, and whose members still retain their relative position in the world—neither write nor preach the great truths contained in its revealments, only in a diluted form; who still hang on to the old, not caring to give up; who are not ready to sacrifice for truth, that the world may be better; if it is to mean that to the world, then I answer, it is good as far as it goes, but does not fulfill its mission. Spiritualism is a deep spiritual truth, to be taught and received in the world as one of the great factors in the unfoldment of mankind. It is a deep spiritual message to the world, and those who are ready for this message will receive it and be helped along the journey of life; to those who are not ready, it has no message for them.

To my mind, an organization is a means toward an end; it helps to make and establish conditions in which this message is to be given to the world. The good and glorious benefit done for mankind through these means can never be measured. The work of the pioneers gone to the interior life will never be known; the souls fed, uplifted, and spiritualized by these teachings form one vast army whose numbers cannot be counted.

It is useless for me to say aught of the physical phenomena; its facts stand before the world, and cannot be successfully contradicted. What, then, have we to say of the mental and spiritual phenomena that confronts us, for I contend that while one is a phenomenon, the mental is no less an one. The history of those who stand before the world as teachers will bear me out in those statements; and I can see no harm or feel no fear that we should take our place in the great religious as well as scientific world as helpers to educate mankind along higher planes of thought. In order to do this more effectually, the Spiritualists, as a body, should unite in organizations, that these teachings be better understood. Who can estimate the great good, the liberalizing influence, the spiritualizing thoughts of our great camps, to say nothing of any other source. If it is to be purely a scientific fact, and no organized effort to proclaim these truths, then these great centers of spiritual thought would have to go; and if it is right to organize in one case, it is right to organize in another.

I can see no harm in opening our meetings with prayer, if the spirits so desire; they know better than we what is essential. There is no speaker who opens meeting with prayer but teaches the people that that prayer will not be answered, that no law will be set aside for any desire on the part of any one expressed in a thought. There are those who pray, and those who do not; all have the same courtesy and the same privilege of expressing their views.

As to half-rate privileges; if those who have so much to say in condemning a courtesy and kindness extended by the railroads, would put their hands deep into their pockets and pay the expense of the mediums and speakers, I would have nothing to say; but as it is, the work is made easier, and many can do a missionary work they could not do without it. I, for one, feel no humiliation when I receive such kindness from railroads, and it does not cost the Spiritualists anything, and is a matter that does not concern them.

To be sure, the spiritual phenomena have always been, in all ages, and to all peoples; but we must remember the difference in intellectual development in the different eras of the world. Now the phenomena are better understood, and the teachings always are for the higher cultivation of the people. Suppose we do formulate a statement of our position. No one can enter any argument but what he must formulate his position; if he does not, then he has no power. So with us. And I do not fear we will become creed-bound, nor that we shall become fossilized into a movement which will ultimately say: "Believe, or be damned!" But I do know, the time is coming when there will be a better system established between the two worlds, and every society will have not only the physical phenomena, but the mental, and people will gather up the facts, and go on to a higher understanding. Yes, organize. Let us have the scientific, the ethical, the spiritual, those deep truths that sink into the soul and lives of mankind.

G. H. BROOKS.

A STEP IN ADVANCE

Of All the Religions in the World.

To your question, should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science? I would make answer, that from my point of view, it is clear to myself at least, Spiritualism should take its place just a step in advance of the great religions of the world, because it is the flowering out and fruit of all of them in the order of progression. It should also take its proper position in the domain of science, to furnish evidence and also to demonstrate that man, built as he is on scientific principles, is at last learning himself and his powers and how he is related to all that is beneath and above him, and therefore it is required of him, aided by the higher light now shining upon and through him, to classing all phenomenal and inspirational manifestations as the results of spirits excarnate working upon and through mortal mediums.

This classification is the next step to be taken. It will give dignity and prestige to the movement.

We have been taught by our spiritual guides and teachers, that religion and science are lovely twin sisters and their services to each other and to humanity should not be separated, but conducted in such manner as to promote the best interest one for another.

The phenomenal phases attract man's attention, the philosophy interests and instructs him, and this pure soul religion is intended to uplift and draw him nearer to God.

Then, too, it has so long and so often been told that there would be on earth one universal religion. That it is being worked for from all sides is proven by the religious unrest and revision of creeds, etc.

To compete with the world's great religions for victory or defeat Spiritualism must enter the arena where controversies by tongue and pen are being carried on. It must furnish its quota of truths and facts; not only such facts as pertain to immortality and the communion between mortals and those who by the process of death have put on immortality—these facts are established—but facts that explain clearly the true mission of Jesus of Nazareth through whom the Christ of God so powerfully labored. He being the center and nucleus around which all great modern religions cluster, if they have not the full truth, and the full truth must be known by humanity before the great approaching religious change will be made and these facts upon which hinges the decision, will go down to posterity.

Is it not our duty as mediums and Spiritualists to furnish said facts? Are we not the custodians of this grand religion of the soul?

And is it not made plain by this grand soul science that there is a spiritual kingdom which cannot be discerned by the world's intellectual and material learning, but by the spirit?

When the soul powers become aroused and grasp the significance of their attachment to this Inner Source of true life, love and truth, and thus become one with God, then only can the truth of this spiritual kingdom and the Christ mission be comprehended. No historical evidences and no abuses are called for. In the past too much of this has put forth.

It is divinely purposed that wherever the greatest amount of spiritual truth records itself on the one side and the greatest amount of scientific proof on the other, there the victory rests. That religion which is capable of classifying this grand science of the soul, to set forth its steps of progression from plane to plane and the connecting links between the higher and lower planes, and between the crude and refined expressions which are marks of degree in mental and spiritual attainments—the religion that can do this wins, for it thus demonstrates the living truth of the one great and grand plan of Progression.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION,

Twin Sisters Dwelling Together in Unity.

Returning from Port Angeles several days ago, where I had been called to officiate at a funeral and had spoken in the evening to a representative audience of Spiritualists on the subject, "Is Spiritualism a Science or a Religion," I found awating me your request upon the same subject. Truly we caught the vibration in the Spiritualistic atmosphere. That night after retiring I received the following vision:

I was taken to the entrance of a church or cathedral and as I stood at the open doorway and noticed by the decorations that some event was about to transpire, I observed the many preparations; but what struck me as peculiar was the fact that all was dark. The great marble archway and deep, dark hall shone ghostly in the dim, murky atmosphere. I passed on in and saw the people gathered, and in the dim light I could see the bowed heads of a kneeling congregation. Knees pressed velvet stools, bared foreheads rested upon the backs of softly cushioned pews and a heavy silence reigned o'er all—but still no illumination; only that dim light. I stood unseen, and wondered, when my attention was drawn to the pulpit. It was a raised platform with a dome-like roof, no minister being in sight. I waited expectantly, thinking to see a priest and his choir boys enter in all the pomp and glory of some momentous occasion; but as I gazed "a light not seen on sea or land" slowly arose and spread all over the dome-like roof and out over the heads of the kneeling throng, and after quivering in a radiant mass of glorious light, like unto divine benediction, it slowly withdrew from the vaulted roofs and dim confines, out, out! Silently the audience arose and started up an inclined passage-way which opened for them, and which led out. As I saw them file two by two through the now fast dimming aisles, they became, as they reached the passage, a great flock of sheep, and were unconsciously following the light which had gone before, but had now disappeared. As they emerged from the church they seemed to be coming almost from the roof, and then, on what, for lack of better description, I will say looked like a log-chute that I have seen on the Columbia River, I saw them all rush down to what appeared to be certain destruction. I continued to gaze, and saw as they disappeared a great bank of fog arise; and they were shut from my view for a time. When again I saw this chute, it was ascending upward and my sheep were coming up out of the fog. As they attained their former level, not a church offered a safe refuge, but a vast, wide-spreading field, with green grass; silvery streams winding in and out; great snow-capped mountains to the north; the silver shimmer of the foam-crested Pacific and Atlantic glimmering in the distance; and to the south, field after field of golden grain, while over all, radiating the vaulted dome of the heaven's blue, this same glorious light shone with unconfined splendor.

My reading is this: Spiritualism is the light that must enter as religion into the churches to lead them out of dim aisles and confined walls; and that we are like unto a flock of sheep—we need a "bellwether." After leaving the forms, ceremonies and creeds we seem to be lost in a fog, but, wandering awhile, we find ourselves in broad fields and under nature's canopy, with the golden light of science shining o'er all, and we arise, Monte Cristo-like, and find the world is ours. In the study of astronomy we find God's handiwork; in chemistry his hand-writing; in geology his history; in botany his artistic touch; and over all, in all, and through all, we hear his voice speaking to us, and we learn to worship at Nature's shrine. Science with her glorious teachings is but the open gateway to the religious soul of man. A constant Te Deum of praise is being chanted by the heart that has come to realize its Oneness. Science and religion are but twin sisters dwelling together in unity,—our elder teachers that are guiding humanity into a realization of their eternal foundation upon the records of time.

TRUTH, NOT THEORY.

Spiritualism the Support of Science.

The space to answer this important query is but a half column, hence to illustrate and analyze is out of the question. It is the truth we want, not theory nor sophistry. Theory belongs in the laboratory; sophistry, to religion, and facts for the people when writing upon a subject of this kind.

Spiritism belongs to religion; Spiritualism, to science. Since the advent of religion spiritism has been practiced by most all creeds.

Religion and spiritism are material.

Spiritualism is spiritual and the root or predicate of science. Science is spiritual and not material. Spiritual science is the handmaid of Divine Truth. Spiritualism is the support of science. To comprehend and fully solve any problem we must approach from the spiritual standpoint.

Spiritual science with us merges into Divine science when we once have taken up our residence inside the Circle of Justice. Spiritualism is the foundation upon which we erect our temple and plant the tree of Spiritual science. All truth comes through and over the avenues of science.

Bear in mind, kind reader, I only use science spiritually, I have not anything to do with religious, or more proper, so-called material science.

Religion is material and the father of rank materialism.

There is not one evil upon this planet but can be traced to religion, wherefore religion is the cause of evil. Again religion is but an effect. Who fathered religion? Perfidious man. The priests of religion have been and are the curse of the earth. Religion is man-made. It has no place in Eternity. It can only exist with cold, crude matter.

Spiritualism is eternal. "Forever" is written over the entrance to her temples. Through those temples we must pass ere we can enter the one mighty temple that encircles all place. That wondrous temple is Eternity. We are living on the confines of that magnificent temple.

We are to that Eternity just what Arizona and New Mexico are to this Union of States; wards, and we must make ourselves worthy before we can enter.

There are two kinds of life upon this planet; spirit life and evil life. Howbeit all evil life must contain a little spirit or it would be wanting in its adhesiveness and could not exist as a serpent, pest or other evil beast. The priests of religion, medicine and politics, furnish that little spirit.

Thoughts are things.

In the absence of principle there can be no Justice and they that are not just are not honest.

Again: There are two planes on the other side—the material and the spiritual plane. Ninety-eight per cent of the people of this planet are born upon the material plane and they know as little about the spiritual plane as the material mediums through whom they express.

Progression is the tocsin of Spiritualism. "Know thyself." Do you, or do you not?

Twenty years ago I knew a Spiritist slate-writer. He posed as a Spiritualist. Not long since I saw his "ad" dealing out the same old wares over the same old counter, and he is called a Spiritualist.

Come right down to the truth, reader, and admit that Spiritualists, Scientists and Christians are few and far between.

Religion has filled the earth with sophists.

Reader, do you believe that the other side of life is a catch-as-catch-can, go-as-you-please country? Have you ever solved any of the many beautiful problems that you have seen?

Out of the hatcheries of religion come the Booths, the assassins, thieves and murderers, fakirs, knaves and hypocrites. Can you realize it? Are you one who goes into hysterics over a little tobacco smoke, yet has a passion, such as jealousy, bigotry, avarice, etc?

If you are a Spiritualist you will be a person of principle and support Justice and Truth. Only that which is supported by principle is Eternal.

Religion was created by the priests for the purpose of supporting their gods. There are many gods and their names are Mammon. God is the creation of priestcraft.

The priest, his religion, creeds and gods are masculine. Masculinity, proper, is a principle.

Spiritualism, science, spirit, the divine arts, and divine virtues are feminine; so, too, is divinity. Sitting in that wonderful temple (Eternity) we shall behold our Divine Mother clothed with every virtue and crowned with a halo of love. In that Temple there is no law. Justice dwells in that Temple.

Our Mother hath no commands. She smiles upon her children with love, and they rejoice and follow their Mother's example.

DR. GEORJEAN MILLER.

Latham, Ark.

Belongs to the Domain of Religion.

This is indeed "an important question," for to me it seems to hold in its answer the life duration of the movement—movement not of the intellect only, but of the very heart of mankind. The telegraph, telephone, magnetic battery, or X-Ray, call at once upon the intellect, and we are intensely interested that we may know the Cosmic Law of this operation; but our heart and life is not touched by either of them. We use them in our business, but we shed no tears; nor are we drawn upon in our affections, as we study their mechanism. But Spiritualism, on the other hand, does have to do with the tenderest, and consequently highest emotions of the soul of man.

This being so, it belongs of right to the domain of Religion. In fact, this is a proven statement; for there has never been "a great religion" that was not based upon the known facts of Spiritualism.

The Editor is right, as he says: "The fact is, spirit phenomena cannot be patented or copyrighted"—it is common to mankind, and instinctively appeals to the religious or emotional instincts of the race. Scientific investigation will, however, mold the character of its establishment as a distinct cult. We need the aid of science in all such discoveries, where the mind is swayed by them, lest we forget ourselves, and allow superstition rather than reason to assume the throne of judgment.

I am a Spiritualist, because in this new development of mental, of psychic research, I see, or think I see, the possibilities of a religion that is not afraid of science. We may welcome investigation, and at the same time retain all the virtue of our religion. Science may tell by what cosmic laws the communications are possible, but religion alone can determine the spiritual value of the facts discovered.

Restores Eyesight

"Actina," a Wonderful Discovery Which Cures Diseased Eyes, No Matter Whether Chronic or Acute, Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need for cutting, drugging or probing the eye for any form of disease, for a new system of treating afflictions of the eye has been discovered whereby all torturous and barbarous methods are eliminated. This wonderful treatment takes the form of a Pocket Battery and is known as "Actina." It is purely a home treatment and self-administered by the patient. There is no risk of experimenting, as thousands of people have been cured of blindness, failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye through this grand discovery, when eminent oculists termed the cases incurable. This wonderful remedy also makes the use of spectacles unnecessary, as it not only removes the weakened and unnatural conditions of the eye, but gives it a clear vision.

A. O. T. Pennington, Massachusetts building, Kansas City, Mo., says: "Actina," cured my mother of cataracts and cured me of asthma.

W. J. Reed, 500 Prospect avenue, Kansas City, Mo., says: My sister was STONE BLIND and "Actina" restored her sight perfectly after oculists had failed.

L. B. Bailey, New England building, Kansas City, says: "Actina" cured me of catarrh and is the best thing to cure colds.

W. R Owens, Adrian, Mo., writes: "Actina" saved me from going BLIND.

Robert Baker, 80 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill., writes: I should have been blind had I not used "Actina."

This method of treatment has been given a thorough test and thousands have been cured after being pronounced incurable.

Advice FREE. FREE treatment at office. "Actina" is sent on trial to out-of-town people. Call or write for Prof. Wilson's 100-page Treatise on the Eye and Its Disease and disease in general free on application. Address New York and London Electric Ass'n., Dept. T, 929 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

THE QUESTION.

A Religion That Is Based on Science.

The question which the Editor asks to have solved is whether Spiritualism should take its place in the world as a religion based on the love and worship of God—as a system of Divine worship, or whether it should be considered as a scientific fact simply, and should take its place by the side of the discovery of the law of gravity, of chemical affinities, of electricity and of other physical forces.

I unhesitatingly answer that it should not take its place as either of these nor be treated as either. It belongs outside of them both. It is not a religion, if religion must be based on the worship of God. I know that Webster thus defines it, but we have a right, under the law of language, to use a word somewhat outside its dictionary meaning, if our use of it is sustained by the scholars of the land. "Good usage" is the authority to which dictionary makers go in giving definition of words.

Have we any example where scholars as a rule use the word religion in a different sense from what it is used in the question, i. e., as a system of worship? We have. The teachings of Confucius are, everywhere among educated people, spoken of as a "religion," and yet the Encyclopedia Britannica says these "teachings are hardly more than pure secularism" with "no piety" in them. Confucius speaks of "heaven" but he never mentions any belief in a Supreme Being, much less did he advocate or practice his worship. He was simply a moral teacher.

The same is true of Buddha. The teachings of Buddha are, even in the orthodox pulpits of to-day, spoken of as a religion, and yet the Encyclopedia Britannica speaks of Buddhism as "a religion which ignores the existence of God and denies the existence of the soul." Now, what I claim is, that, if it is "good usage," even among orthodox Christians, to apply the word religion to teachings which ignore the very existence of God and prayers to God and the worship of God, and are even silent on the existence of a future world, then much more is it "good usage" to apply the word religion to the experiences and lessons of life to be drawn from the teachings of Spiritualism. I say much more is it proper because Spiritualism does teach and prove the existence of a future life which Confucius and Buddha failed to do or did but feebly.

Why is it that the teachings of Confucius and Buddha are called religions, even though the worship of God is not a part of them? It is because they are moral systems, designed to alleviate suffering and misery, to lead men away from sin and selfishness and strife into the practice of goodness and principles of peace and better habits of life. Even the teachings of Jesus made this their primal object. He is not known in history, even in the church and gospel records, as the worshiper of God, but as the "savior of the world" from sin.

Now, it is evident, the question whether the teachings which come from the other world can be properly called a religion, depends upon whether they are moral in their tendency taken as a whole; whether when analyzed, arranged and classified they constitute what may rightfully be called a moral system, as do the teachings of Confucius and Buddha. I claim they do. The one central fact upon which all spirits agree, whether high or low, is that the condition in which a person finds himself on entering spirit life depends on what he was in earth life. If one on earth was sordid, selfish and profligate, whether he was high or low, rich or poor, king or peasant, he wakes up in the other life in darkness or semi-darkness, in a country where beautiful scenery is no where to be seen but only barrenness, desolation and gloom. The house he occupies is a hut; the clothes which cover him are poor, threadbare and shabby.

Think of such a world for a man or woman whose chief happiness on earth was found in the pride and satisfaction they felt in their wealth, their luxuries and their position. The fact is, if people positively knew to the full extent the consequences which inevitably follow a base, mean, reckless or brutal existence on earth, as the main tenor of spirit teachings show, it would make such a moral revolution in the social and business world as has never been known.

I say then if Buddhism is universally recognized as a religion because it is a moral system, how much more is Spiritualism a religion, whose inducements for right living surpass not only Buddhism but any religion or system of ethics now known on earth.

I come now to the second part of the question: whether Spiritualism is not to be considered simply as a scientific fact, to take its place by the side of other scientific facts? I reply "yes" to the first part of the question and "no" to the second part. I agree that it is a scientific fact. But, as to the second part, it would violate the laws of classification to enroll it among the physical facts or discoveries of science, as much as it would to put the mineral kingdom into the same class with the vegetable, or the vegetable into the same class with the animal, or a piece of rock into the flower group, or to class a human soul with a pine tree. The lessons from spirit teachings which we are considering are moral and belong to the moral realm, while the discoveries of Edison are physical. And there is a vast difference—a vast difference between the fact of sympathy or law, or the lesson of the golden rule, and the fact that common salt is the chloride of sodium, or that water is composed of a union of oxygen and hydrogen. The world does not treat the two the same.

My space is limited, but there is one more point I must notice. The writer of the question intimates that as no societies are organized and money contributed to propagate the knowledge of chemistry or of astronomy, or to prevail on people to believe in the law of gravity—in as much as Edison, after he makes a discovery, leaves it to take care of itself and goes about another investigation, why should Spiritualists, after having demonstrated the fact of spirit return, organize into societies to try to convince the world that they are right? Christians do this way because their religion is one of faith, but ours is proven.

I reply, that it is not true that scientific truths are left alone to struggle for a continuance of life. It is not true that there are no organizations to spread abroad the knowledge of Chemistry, Geology, Astronomy, Biology and every other branch of science. There is probably more money spent and more effort made in the interest of science than in the interest of the Christian religion. Our colleges and academies and high schools and all our higher institutions of learning have organized departments with high priced teachers and costly apparatus and libraries of books to make widespread all knowledge which science has brought to light. Spiritualism is then a religion based on science and stands therefore independent and alone.

YES, AND NO.

To the Question, Is Spiritualism a Religion?

In the exclusive, narrow sense, no. In the broad, progressive sense, yes. If religion means worship of God, and no more, Spiritualism cannot be called religion. But if we include as the most important features love of truth, devotion to right, and expression of spiritual emotions and sentiments, including the altruistic ideals, and reverence for all that is loveable, beautiful and good, then Spiritualism is the most perfect of all religions.

As I understand it Modern Spiritualism is vastly more than inductive science. To know that life continues beyond the grave, and to understand the conditions that relate them to this world, and all the actions and reactions, and special methods, by which free communications are established, belongs to science. To know and apply the supreme significance of life, the spiritual lessons of love, duty and devotion, to the ordering of our lives and bettering human society, may involve much of science, but it is more.

Science knows by the intellect. Religion knows by the spirit and moral emotions. Science analyzes; religion feels and moves to execute duty. Spiritualism is both. It appeals to the intellect and furnishes a solvent for cosmic problems, opens the mystic passage in the valley of shadows, and demonstrates the continuity of human life, with all its individual characteristics, and this is science.

It appeals to the highest sentiments, sweetest emotions, tenderest sympathies, purest virtues, and inspires its true disciples with love for humanity, reverence for truth, and earnest desires for knowledge of all righteousness, and blessings for the sin-sick and sorrowing, and impels to action in every true reform. This is its religion.

Science is the knowledge of spiritual laws and relations, and the methods employed in communication between the two worlds.

Religion is the science of life and immortality applied for the healing of the nations.

Without its religion the science of Spiritualism would be a cold, barren field; with religion to illustrate and apply its knowledge, it becomes a beautifully decorated garden, breathing loveful incense, and warming the measureless expanse with humanitarian affections, philanthropic societies, sacred love feasts, balmy airs, musical appeals that charm and exalt, and the spiritual cosmos becomes an enchanted scene where all our faculties may find full expression and free employment forever. Yes! Spiritualism is the science of religion and the religion of science.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

SIMPLY FACT.

It Is Neither Religion nor Philosophy.

In response to your courteous invitation, I will state briefly my view of Spiritualism, for your symposium.

Spiritualism stands for a fact, or rather two facts:

1. A spirit state or continued life after so-called death;

2. Communication between human beings in either spirit or mortal state.

If Spiritualism has not established these facts, it has no excuse for being. If it has established them, then its purpose must be educational rather than religious, and sooner or later will enforce the acceptance of its facts upon the world's scientists and philosophers as well as religionists.

Spiritualism, per se, is not a religion, nor can it be any more than Vegetarianism or Hypnotism. Its facts may be made cardinal tenets of a religion and they are not inconsistent with any religion worthy of the name. Spiritualism simply proclaims future life as a demonstrated fact, while philosophy and religion postulate it as a hope or a reasonable probability.

Human beings in spirit state appear to differ as widely in their views of philosophy and religion as those in this life; hence the difficulty of establishing a distinct philosophy that shall be acceptable to all Spiritualists. We can all agree as to facts, but each one is bound to accept for himself that philosophy or that religion which to his mind best accords with and explains the facts. I have accepted Psychosophy (as taught by the guides of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond as a religious philosophy and a philosophical religion, for the following reasons which I quote from an able exponent of Psychosophy:

1. Because Psychosophy (soul-teaching) tells me what I am, from whence I came, and whither I am going. Spiritualism does not.

2. Because Psychosophy gives me the clearest possible perception of God and my soul's relation to the Infinite. Spiritualism does not.

3. Because Psychosophy shows the supreme beauty and explains the mission of the Christ or Messianic life. Spiritualism does not.

4. Because Psychosophy offers a clear and rational explanation of the seeming inequalities in human life, and solves the many problems that have troubled the minds of men and philosophers in all ages. Spiritualism only partially does these things.

5. Because Psychosophy deals with psychic phenomena and proves the continued existence of man's spirit after the change called death. Spiritualism does just this and is therefore included in Psychosophy.

6. Because Psychosophy teaches the relation of man's spirit to his body, and shows how physical health is obtained and preserved by a harmonious adjustment between the two. Spiritualism is silent here.

7. Because Psychosophy teaches psychology from the standpoint of spirit (or cause) instead of from the standpoint of matter and effect. Spiritualism squints on this point.

8. Because Psychosophy is in earnest sympathy and hearty co-operation with all efforts and reforms tending to the improvement of man's social and industrial condition. Spiritualism leads up to this.

9. In short, because Psychosophy is the religion of humanity and the philosophy of life. Spiritualism is neither religion nor philosophy but simply fact.

NATURAL ALLIES.

Religion Is as Necessary to Reason, as Reason to Religion.

A prominent American has said that talking not only expresses our opinions to others but helps us to find out what our own thoughts are. The Progressive Thinker seems to hold a kindred conviction. Its requests for the views of its readers upon special questions indicate its belief that writing makes an exact man and that it can thereby aid in concentrating fugitive opinions and give definiteness to their expression. It is quite possible that the framing of the replies will bring greater educational clarification to some of the writers than actual enlightenment to all of their readers.

Shall Spiritualism be considered a religion or a science? It is for me a religion, which embraces all the certainties of science—in other words, a scientific religion, in so far as those terms are permissible. It combines the exactness of the one with the spiritual development of the other. Until man's innermost nature shall have been reconstructed he will remain, as he has been for ages, a religious animal.

The very asking of the question might imply that science and religion are antagonistic, or that science is more changeless and infallible, or that it covers the entire field of religion, or a greater one. The two are natural allies, each acting in a sense as the other's instructor and yet dealing with some questions that are common to both. Some of us grasp a mere smattering of the conclusions of the world's eminent specialists and hurry pell-mell to proclaim the perfection and inerrancy of science. And yet its pathways of the past are strewn with childhood's crudities, youth's discarded assumptions and manhood's once insistent finalities, now wholly abandoned. Actual measurements have but just demonstrated that the center of gravity for the Leaning Tower of Pisa is within the limits of safety, hence its angle of inclination conforms to law and not to accident.

Scientists of the Smithsonian Institute are reported agitated over a coming revolution in the philosophy accounting for the phenomenon of light, made necessary by the discovery of a new luminiferous element. The specialists gathered in congress at the university of Chicago during January may have foreshadowed a complete revision of the theories explaining the physiological powers and processes of the human body. Science as a whole is as much a shifting mental kaleidoscope as religion is a spiritual one. Both are on the forward march in search of a permanent bivouac ground.

Not a few of our misunderstandings result from failure to agree upon a standard definition of terms, hence the rabid narrowness of our partisanship. What is science? Lockyer tells us the work of the true man of science is a perpetual striving after a better and closer knowledge of the planet on which his lot is cast, and of the universe in the vastness of which that planet is lost.

Dr. Parkhurst tersely states for me the limitations of science in these words: "Science is busy with the hither end of things, not the thither end."

It does not solve the problem of ultimate possibilities for the human soul. If we turn to Huxley, "Science is nothing but trained and organized common sense;" to Ruskin, "You must not talk before you know;" to Mill, "the progress of science mainly consists in ascertaining certain fixed conditions under which phenomena invariably happen;" to Harvey, "Science is teaching man to know and reverence truth;" to another, "Science is a knowledge gained by observation, experiment and reasoning, co-ordinated and systematized." What is there in all this that raises science to a plane superior to religion? I understand the latter to be a belief in and reverence for a Supreme Mind and Will directing the universe through creative power and fixed laws. I cordially endorse the second principle of the N. S. A. platform, that the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are the expressions of Infinite Intelligence.

Recognition of the truth that if spirit communication occurs it is because the laws governing both realms make it possible, influenced my acceptance of Spiritualism. I believe in prayer because it enlists in our behalf the intelligences from the spheres beyond us, who are moved by the importunity of our desires; because spirit entities offer positions of exalted inspiration through human mediums, who never pray of themselves; because it puts the individual soul in touch with the highest spiritual forces within our ken. A Methodist minister recently said to a conference of his associates: "The outcome does not depend upon prayer. The attitude of the soul in the presence of Divine Power is what counts—it should be reverence, gratitude, love and trust." Neither ridicule nor dictatorial omniscience disturbs me in this position. Religion once became dominant and science groped in chains through the darkness of the Middle Ages. Enthrone science and you invite the manifestation of new injustice. Hold each within its own natural confines and they become sometimes collaborations, and always friends.

Carlyle's words speak for many hearts: "The dwelling and birthplace of religion is in the soul of man, and it is eternal as the being of man—there is an infinitude above him and beneath him, and an eternity encompasses him on this hand and on that,—tones of sphere music and tidings from loftier worlds will flit round him, if he can but listen, and visit him with holy influences, even in the thickest press of trivialities, or the din of busiest life."

If Spiritualism is to be a science and nothing more, it will be found wanting by a far greater host than now so hold it, even though the latter are intelligent and influential. Take that step and a multitude will carry its truth and themselves into the folds of the Liberal churches. Make it what it should be, the purest of all religions. Say what you mean, and mean what you say.

A SCIENTIFIC RELIGION

It Is Religion and a Science.

"Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?"

This is a question which comes to us for a symposium on the status of Spiritualism. It is assumed that Spiritualism cannot be both a scientific and a religious question—that if Spiritualism is a religion it is at war with science, and vice versa. I apprehend that I am not the only writer who will deny the assumption, as it remains to be demonstrated that religion and science are necessarily inimical to each other. In the body of the circular we have this proposition:

"Whether the phenomena, the direct result of spirit intercourse, should become the foundation of a new creed, a new sect, a system of worship, or the basis of a religious cult, or should simply be recognized as a scientific fact and treated exclusively as such, just as any new discovery always is, and no more sacred than any other phenomenon brought to light in the natural world, is a question you are called upon to consider."

To answer this and make a full argument will require more space than can be given in a symposium. And to answer it too briefly will subject one to the shafts of criticism and ridicule which he could escape if he had time and space to make a full answer. Let me say, in commencing, that Spiritualism is both a religion and a science. In other words, it is a scientific religion.

There has grown up in the world a superficial idea of religion. It is supposed among us so-called Christians to mean the worship of an eccentric, erratic and capricious creature called "God." Some time ago I noticed a criticism of something I had said, by a good brother, charging that religion was a prolific cause of wars and bloodshed. He had merely assumed that a new form of paganism labeled Christianity by Constantine, which name has ever since adhered to it, and Mohammedanism were the true representatives of all religions. None of the other nine great religions including Christianity ever waged a war or even punished heretics. Christianity while it was on the earth was always opposed to war and persecution, or even the shedding of blood. Hundreds of Christians suffered martyrdom rather than go to war. Their plea always was: "I am a Christian and cannot fight." What we now call Christianity is a monstrosity, a mongrel, a religion with religion left out. It is neither Christian nor Pagan, and holds about the same relation to either that a mule does to a horse or donkey. It is only a nominal guide to the ethics which it preaches, but never practices. Mammon is its god and Mother Grundy is its holy Virgin or Goddess.

Neither does the idea of religion necessarily involve the idea of an omnipotent overruling Deity. The Chinese pay homage to no such authority; neither did the Greek, Hebrew or Christian religions. And now that I come to think of it I am doubtful whether any of the other religions did. The Hebrew recognized an Elohim, or a school of Gods which ruled before their time, and after they came to be a nation they recognized for awhile Jehovah and afterwards Adonis, all of whom were limited as to power by circumstances and conditions by which they were environed. With the exception of Adonis these guardian gods were human spirits, and possibly the Phenician god adopted by the Hebrews after the abandonment of Jehovah was also a spirit. There was no such worship of either of them as we worship now. There was ritualism, it is true, but it is a question whether that was not merely for the benefit of the priests, as we now contribute through the various manipulations of legal enactments, through tariffs, money made for money dealers, subsidies, etc., for the benefit of monopolies. Judaism consisted mostly of a code of laws, and let me say here that but for the penalties attached to them our own country with a similar code of laws would be in a much better condition than it now is. Such squalor and poverty, now the "pride" of our institutions, would be impossible under the Mosaic system.

Christianity as taught by Jesus and lived by the people called Christians for near three centuries after his time was what we would now call by the two names of Socialism and Spiritualism. Its socialism was communistic in character, but it contemplated the establishment of a socialistic form of government. It was based upon intercourse with the spirit world, just as Spiritualism now is, and recognized a universal force or source of life in nature to which it gave the Greek name THEOS, and which many Spiritualists now term God. That they paid homage to this universal force we have no certain evidence. It is true that Jesus said Theos seeks his worshipers among those who "worship in spirit and truth," and Paul declared unto the Athenians him whom they ignorantly worshiped, but each of these expressions leaves the matter obscure. All people venerate some things, if we may call the act of veneration worship, and the ordinary understanding of worship is veneration, the man who venerates the dollar is called a worshiper of Mammon, and so we may be said to be worshipers of flowers, paintings, landscapes, the sunset, poetry, music, etc., and as we pay a compliment to the author of a piece of poetry or work of art by our admiration, so we also compliment nature, or the forces of nature, when we admire a piece of landscape or a pretty child. If this is worship we are all worshipers, and somehow we love him of her best who worships most. In all the great religions, with the alleged exception of the Hebrew and Christian, the sun was worshiped as the Father of all life, and yet these peoples all contemplated a life still higher and beyond that of the sun. No man can love the beautiful without complimenting the author of the beautiful. If it is a work of art, we compliment the genius that created the work; if it is a work of nature then we contemplate its magnificence in the same way. Nolens volens, we are worshipers.

I am aware that when I assert that Christianity was founded on intercourse with the spirit world, some one will dispute me, but under the circumstances I can only make the assertions. It requires a course of ten lectures to fully develop and demonstrate the subject. I hope sometime to write out these lectures and have them printed in book form.

In the above circular we are told that "They fail to understand why a religion should be formulated from the fact that Guiteau, who assassinated President Garfield, or Booth, who cruelly murdered President Lincoln, can return to earth and communicate with their friends." I cannot understand why they should fail to understand this. Nearly all Spiritualists, except phenomenalists and test hunters, agree that if we can know these facts, we should be able to conduct ourselves differently from what we otherwise would. In 1896 there were only two Spiritualists in all the State prisons in the United States, against something over seven hundred Methodists (I have the exact number at home but I am writing away from home), and a corresponding number from each of the other churches. Why is this?—why so much larger percentage of the church element find their way into the State prisons than of Spiritualists? The answer is not hard to find. Spiritual Spiritualists are a class of persons who invite the co-operation of all good spirits and those qualified to assist them in living moral and upright lives, while members of churches, as a rule, make it very uncomfortable for a refined and sensitive spirit to remain in their surroundings. Thus they are by their spirituality protected in times of temptation, while those who reject Spiritualism are liable to be exposed to the influences of a conscienceless class of less sensitive spirits, some of whom have never yet found out they were in the spirit world. It is quite probable that further inquiry would have developed the fact that the two Spiritualists in prison then, were either innocent or probably mere phenomenalists, who could not be persuaded to either hear a Spiritualist lecture or read a Spiritualist paper.

Spiritualism means really the development and cultivation of the higher faculties, and as such it is a religion. Everything that makes for the intellectual and moral growth of the individual may be termed as of a religious character. This is so as seen among the worshipers of Osiris, Brahmanism, Mosaism, Buddhism, Zoronstrism, Parsaism, Confucianism, and Christianism, and in a sense Mohammedanism. In Judaism Spiritualism through its prophets was a guardian of the state, and it is as true as remarkable, that the state went down when it turned a deaf ear to the mediums. "Where there is no vision the people perish." When Jesus made his last visit to Jerusalem it was with a purpose of carrying to them the great message he had received from the spirit world, and if they had listened to that message the destruction of Jerusalem would not have occurred.

There is an organ in the human brain called Spirituality, which with Veneration crowns the intellectual part of man and forms a keystone binding the entire brain together. It cannot be taken out of the human organism without collapsing the brain. If there is no use for it, then nature made a mistake in placing it there. But nature makes no mistakes, however many of them may be found in the Bible. Spirituality, veneration and sublimity are all religious faculties and cannot be removed without turning our faces over on a line with our spines. This would force us to either go bent over or on all fours, unless we were required to walk backward. Spiritualism gives full force to all these faculties, as nothing else does, and the philosophy which is a part of its religion, and a part, a large part of Spiritualism gives these organs full play. These organs are adapted to a religion, they are a religious element in our natures. Spiritualism supplies the demand made by these organs. That some have them insufficiently developed to appreciate religion, argues no more against religion than that some who are color blind argues the non-existence of colors.

Nor are creeds necessary to the expression of religion. If a person wants a creed, he should have it, and he also should have the privilege of changing his creed every day if he wants to, or oftener. Nor am I troubled at all about prayers. If a person wants to pray, what business is it of mine? It won't hurt me any. I don't have to pray when he does, nor sneeze if he takes snuff. Can't we all agree together to allow each one to worship in his own way, or no way? I believe in individual sovereignty in all things, and in the matter of conformity in the exercise of religion just as in everything else. There is no danger of my soul going to the eternal Bow-wows because some Spiritualist spells his deity with three letters and bows his head in worship of him. If I am not on good terms with his God, that is no sign he should quarrel with him, or that I should quarrel with him because he likes a God I never could bear.

Science, Philosophy and Religion.

In your communication of January 1, 1902, you say that Spiritualism has assumed special prominence throughout the world; and to-day the question naturally arises, what is its exact status, considered from a religious, philosophical or scientific standpoint? You further ask whether Spiritualism should take its place among the great religions or the cause of its phenomena be assigned to a place in the domain of science, by the side of the wonderful achievements of Edison, Tesla and others? To this last I would say, my opinion is that Spiritualism is the foundation of all religions; and the phenomena are the scientific facts that prove it.

To me Spiritualism embodies all of the essential elements of science, philosophy, and religion. In the phenomena we have the binding anew of the demonstrations of the past ages, for it is an incontrovertible fact that the phenomena that are taking place to-day have taken place ever since we have any history of the human race, from the times of Aristotle, Socrates, Buddha, and Jesus, all of these demonstrations have been seen and heard.

Religion to me does not mean a creed, a dogma of man-made origin, such as is attached to the churches of to-day, but is something that is present in every living thing, a high sense of moral obligation and a spirit of reverence for all things that are good and true, and regulates our conduct or more technically, ethics, which includes all the acts and feelings of man, in so far as they are related to his duties to himself and to his fellow-man, and to the fundamental ideas of right and wrong.

Spiritualism is a science because it is a knowledge, penetrating and comprehensive, embracing all of the knowledge we have of an existence after the death of the physical body. Through the phenomena we acquire a knowledge of what our lives will be after we are born into a new life, into another sphere where we can progress on and on towards perfection. And the philosophy of Spiritualism teaches us to live better and more honorable lives so that we may begin our career as spiritual beings on a higher plane than we otherwise could; for we take up our work there just as we have it here. It teaches that to be good and do all we can to help our fellow beings in this life is the true aim of our being. I should regret very much if the organizing of Spiritualists into societies leads to creeds and dogmas of the dark ages. I trust it will lead to the higher and nobler things.

SPIRITUALISM.

Is It Science, or Is It Religion?

A definition of the words must be given if there is an intelligent answer to the foregoing question. Religion, what is it? We wish it understood that we do not confound religion with the counterfeits that all along down through the ages have tried to present themselves to mankind and be accepted as the genuine. To our understanding religion is the science of spiritual things; and whatever the form of belief which is presented, that does not make any difference as long as the right interpretation is given. Do religion and science agree? From our point of observation we assert that they do, whatever the external appearances may be to the contrary. As we observe the passing of the day from its dawn until its close, the appearance is that it is the sun that moves, but astronomical science tells us that it is not the sun but the earth which moves, and we accept astronomical science as correct.

What is science? Webster defines it as "the comprehension or understanding of truth or facts by the mind." Now, the philosophy of Spiritualism defines the truth of the law of the intercommunion of the mortal with the excarnate or immortal mind; and also explains the methods which are best adapted to bring the two phases of existence into communication with each other. Viewed from this standpoint, Spiritualism is a science because it deals with the facts of the case regarding spiritual communion. While a large majority of the religious sects of the world have their theories based upon the hope of a possibility of spirit communion, they do not assert absolute knowledge of the truth of that fact, hence cannot be classed as scientific.

Considered from the standpoint of its influence over human life as it affects the religious and emotional nature, it must be classed as a religion, for certainly none of the material sciences are capable of arousing that interest in human life and its destiny. Their mission is to deal more particularly with those forces that the external life can comprehend, while Spiritualism represents forces that are of such a subtle nature that the materialistic mind is incapable of comprehending them. They may be able to master all of the physical sciences, be adepts in the art of illustrating the truth concerning their operations, but when they come to deal with the forces of the spiritual world, find themselves ignorant of its philosophy, and if willing to be instructed will have to commence at the beginning; the knowledge that they had acquired of the material forces not being available in helping them to make an analysis of the facts which that philosophy has presented.

The great question which at present is very much debated is, should Spiritualism crystallize by the establishment of a new religious organization? The saying that "birds of a feather will flock together" is applicable in the discussion of this question. In any locality where there exists a number of such minds the law of attraction would draw them together for social and spiritual communion, and the tendency of such local societies would be to combine with others and form larger ones; this is simply the operation of one of the natural laws of the universe, and to undertake to prevent its operation would be about as successful as to try to brush back Niagara with a broom.

Why should there be an objection raised to singing and prayer in Spiritualistic meetings because the churches practice it in their communion? It certainly has a tendency to produce harmonious conditions, and there is nothing inconsistent with its use by believers in the Spiritual philosophy, whether in seances or in meetings for social and spiritual communion. Combination is the spirit of the age. On all lines of thought the tendency is to draw nearer together, to remove the obstacles that have caused such external division of sects and parties. There is an influence at work in the ranks of Spiritualits which is seeking to bring them into closer communion; if the world calls it the foundation of a new sect, then so let it be. The foundation of all the religious systems of the world is Spiritualism; it is the vitalizing element which is keeping them alive, remove it and they would be dead matter.

Spiritualism as we understand it is both a religion and a science. It is a religion based upon knowledge, it being capable of presenting actual facts, and is not content with giving mere theories; it has a solid foundation on which to base its argument, this gives it a scientific character. It is the stone cut from the mountain which will yet fill the whole earth. It is the revelation of a law higher than any of the material sciences are capable of evolving, though in the line of duty in which they are engaged they have been important factors in the advancement of life, but when it comes to defining human life and its destiny Spiritualism stands pre-eminent; and a closer communion of all the different phases of its manifestations that are presented to mortals will make it stronger in its influence over human life. All hail to Spiritualism, the rock of ages, the most perfect religion and its demonstration the greatest scientific fact of the age.

Is Spiritualism a Religion?

In reply to your circular, asking the above question, I will say that if Spiritualism means belief in the existence and return of departed spirits, it is simply belief in a fact and has nothing to do with worship, character, theology, religion, morality or anything else but simple fact, and it is to be studied and analyzed the same as any other fact until it is understood.

The early study of any science is likely to awaken a sense of awe, wonder and reverence in a religiously disposed person, and when we get news by mail of the well-being of a long absent friend we may feel thankful and say, "Thank God for this good news," but that does not make letter-writing a religion. The good are not made better by the knowledge of a simple fact in nature, although its study may make one scholastically wiser, nor the bad made worse by it. It is simply a fact and nothing more. I am aware that many things have been pinned onto it which have nothing to do with it, and disorder reigns in consequence. Many of them good in their own places, but they don't belong there.

Now if spirit return is sought to be established as a religion merely for the financial advantages to be gained (when it is known that it does not exhort to devotion or ask for a holy life or belief in Deity) the motive is unworthy and it does not deserve the attention of honorable men and women.

For my part although ever loyal to the "central fact" I cannot call myself a Spiritualist, because I do not endorse its usual teachings as heard on platforms. I regard spirit return simply as a fact proven—nothing more.

SPIRITUALISM.

The Coming Religion of the World.

Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?

If this question is a "proper" one and properly expressed it answers itself, at least in part. If the "proper position" of Spiritualism is "in the domain of science," that, of course, is where it should be assigned. And that is where it will be assigned so far as its scientific aspects are concerned; but such disposition does not for a moment eliminate its religious aspects.

It is a standing wonder to me that intelligent men will so persistently insist on regarding religion and science as separate, distinct and even antagonistic things. If science is, briefly defined, "a classification of facts," in what way does it antagonize religion?

It is universally recognized that the religious sentiment is inherent, it is born with man and manifests itself in accordance with the plane of his intellectual and spiritual development. This fact alone shows that it would be unwise, even if it were possible, to eradicate it, and therefore the alternative is to cultivate and direct it aright, in short to harmonize it with science. By so doing we will have a scientific religion and a religious science. This, I claim, is just what we have in Spiritualism.

There are three marked stages in the evolution of the religious sentiment.

First stage: The church endeavors to dominate science and mould its facts to fit her dogmas.

Second stage: Finding this impossible the church and science separate completely, both claiming that there is nothing in common between them.

Third stage: The recognition of the fact that no truth can contradict another truth, therefore religious truth and scientific truth must harmonize if the point of contact can be found; hence the establishment of a scientific religion. And this, I repeat, the world has to-day in Spiritualism.

In its foundation stone—spirit communion—Spiritualism is a science. In the methods and processes by which that intercourse is attained and performed, it is a philosophy. In the moral and spiritual development, and the relationship which the human mind sustains toward the Infinite Mind, it is a religion. Spiritualism is therefore a science, a philosophy and a religion combined, as has often been said. Or, to quote the words of the lamented and erudite Judge Portis at the dedication of the Church of Spiritual Unity—and which characterization I prefer: "Spiritualism is not a religion, it is religion. It is not a philosophy, it is philosophy. It is not a science, it is science."

When all Spiritualists shall adopt that view and teach it and live it as did the noble and venerable Judge, victory will soon perch upon our banner.

The editor cites the fact that spirit phenomena have occurred in all times and among all peoples. True, and in nearly if not all cases they have been the foundation of the religion of those peoples; but in no single instance, so far as I know, was the real source or purport of those manifestations understood. They were invariably ascribed to gods, demons and other supernatural agencies. Necessarily the religions based upon such errors were themselves erroneous.

Modern Spiritualism is the first recognition of the true source of these phenomena, and its revelations have so completely shifted and changed the whole basis of the religions of the world that a new statement of religious truth is necessitated to fit the later developments. This, I again affirm, Spiritualism does, and therefore should take its place among "the great religions of the world," the greatest of them all.

"But," some will ask, "why not permit the revelations of Spiritualism to be absorbed by the already established religions, and so modify their creeds and dogmas, while we as Spiritualists confine ourselves to its scientific aspects?"

I answer, because that is not the method of Nature, of evolution.

The fundamental principle of evolution is, "the survival of the fittest." The unfit must die, otherwise every improvement acquired by an individual if distributed among the species would be degraded again to the common level.

Interbreeding with the common herd would neutralize all the acquirements of the individual, in the course of time, or dilute it so much that there would be practically no advance.

That which is true of the animal kingdom in evolution is true of religion. I could easily cite innumerable instances of this folly of attempting to "put new wine into old bottles."

Spiritualism is a brand new repository for religious truths, and if we fail to use it as such we commit the folly of follies.

One more point and I have done. If Spiritualism is a science merely, why the large number of periodicals devoted to its promulgation? Why are its rostrum and the columns of its papers so largely devoted to the correction of the religious errors of the popular faiths? Why not be consistent and drop all that irrelevant matter and devote all our time and space to the investigation and promulgation of the "science?" The answer is obvious. Narrow Spiritualism down to its scientific aspects alone, and The Progressive Thinker with its splendid circulation, and all the other Spiritualist periodicals would "die the death," or their clientele be limited to the few who patronize exclusively scientific publications.

No, Spiritualism is not merely a science—unless that term shall include every sentiment and aspiration of the human soul.

In the brightest, truest and sweetest sense it is a religion, and I firmly believe that SPIRITUALISM IS THE COMING RELIGION OF THE WORLD.

LIGHT OF THE SUN.

Divine and Undivine Spiritualism.

To your important question, "Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?" I answer, your question is in order, but can we assign it? Some of it I would like to consign, as well as assign. But the question is, will it assign? For as the light of the sun is to the physical world, so the radiance of Spiritualism—divine Spiritualism—is to the metaphysical world. And as the one is beyond our control, so is the other.

I say divine Spiritualism, in contradistinction to the satanic, for there are both kinds of Spiritualism. For, just as it is in the human world, so it is in the spirit world; spirit life, in the spirit world, like human life, in the human world, is an awful combination of good and evil, satanic and divine, and hard to distinguish between them, as prompters.

But, this we know, the ignorant and vicious there must belong to the satanic, while the intelligent and wise must belong to the divine.

While Spiritualism—the higher Spiritualism—is the world's greatest author, in religion, science, and philosophy, and is the supreme intelligence of the universe, yet, perhaps, its broadest field of usefulness is in the religious world. Its intense sympathy with the religious aspirations of an unfortunate priest-ridden mankind, born and educated with the most irrational religious absurdities, and to emancipate these unfortunate human beings therefrom, makes the religious world the most useful for the exercise of its divine compassion and labor of love.

In religious work, the higher Spiritualism exerts a powerful influence for good, for instance, spirit orations, voiced through mediums, have often marvelous effect upon the lives of hearers, suddenly changing heart and mind of hardened sinners, transforming them into saints.

The higher Spiritualism is positively the world's greatest civilizer, comforter, and happifier. To me it is the light of my life, and the joy of my home. I therefore wish it to continue in all its varied phenomena, as heretofore, in competition with other religions, till all other religions—all undivine, man-made religions are swept from off the face of the earth.

'Tis these religions, worse than Buddhism, worse than Brahmanism, now and in the past, that have been a blighting curse to the religious world.

Religion, true religion, needs no doctrinal dogmas nor books of holy writ, to quarrel about; no priestly anathemas to fear about; no "holy coats" nor sainted bones, nor other tomfooleries, to fool about. Only the religion of the Golden Rule, and correct art of right living, are all that is necessary for this world or the next.

The religion of Spiritualism is the only pure religion in the world, and the only one which gives unmistakable evidence of its divinity, and of the life hereafter.

The subject of religion, while of the greatest importance, is that by which the undivine religious laity is least understood, and who, like sheep following a shepherd, are slaves to an ecclesiastical profession, which profession, because of a little so-called theological education, impudently poses as "doctors of divinity," "ambassadors of Christ," servants of God," "holy fathers," "reverends" and "divines," and who know no more of Christ, God, or the Divine than do the benighted laity themselves. These ecclesiastics, too, refuse to believe in spirit communion, and yet they pose as "Spiritual advisers!"

But so long as these church slaves are unwilling to think and reason for themselves, so long will they be the dupes and victims of a foxy priestcraft.

Surely Spiritualism has been a most potent factor for good, in giving to the world a more rational and sublime religion than had been in the world before; and now that the study of Spiritualism has lately taken its place among the comparatively new sciences, we should give it a wider opportunity than ever before, to express itself in religion, as well as in science.

Chicago, Ill. DR. R. GREER.

Spiritualism a Scientific Religion.

Does the mere fact that we can return after having laid aside the earthly form, tend to spiritualize and uplift us, unless application is made of the truths given us by enlightened spirits? One can believe in communion between the two states of existence, and yet not live the life that spiritualizes.

The true mission of religion is not the promulgation of creed and dogmas, but to lift humanity to higher and better things. When many are associated together with this object in view, there is always encouragement and support for those present, as well as being a moral influence in the community. Whether this association is called a church, a club or a society, it matters not; it is the motive behind.

There was never a need of men and women being more fully religious than now. It should shine forth in our lives, and we should put it into all the active duties of life, to push forward reforms and to help uplift mankind.

The spiritual religion has, from force of necessity, been largely iconoclastic in the past, but now it should be constructive, and build on the solid foundation of scientific facts. We need temples or churches in every community, where our inspired lecturers can teach the masses higher truths than they have known before, and encourage them to lead better and nobler lives. These temples should be dedicated to the spirit world, and should be well lighted, aired and beautifully decorated, and we should have music equal to any in the orthodox churches. In this way alone can we do the greatest good, and be worthy of the trust given us by the enlightened souls who have "gone before."

As a religious body we are even now attracting the attention and consideration of the world at large. This is plainly shown by the eight-page illustrated article in the January Metropolitan Magazine entitled "Spiritualism. What it is and why more than a million intelligent men and women believe in its doctrines."

To my way of thinking the phenomena of Spiritualism is only the a b c of spiritual knowledge, but of course is the foundation of the beautiful structure. This fundamental knowledge has to be given through our worthy mediums, and a thoroughly reliable one should be in the employ of every society. LIDA BRIGGS BROWNE.

SPIRITUALISM FOREVER.

There Is Need of Religion in Spiritualism.

Is the status of Spiritualism religious, philosophical, or scientific? It is all of these.

Religion is the heart. Philosophy and science are of the head. Some of the greatest Protestant divines have agreed that God is an ideal. As such it is beautiful. As such, oratory has found a wonderfully rich field of exercise and culture. Religion is an ideal. It has been food for the starving heart.

The church has said, "though you be perfect in morality and have not religion you are lost." This teaching put a great premium on religion, and discouraged the culture of morality. Religion, morality, and love are all of the heart. Science, philosophy, and all other intellectual subjects are of the head. A head without a heart is not the most comfortable thing to sleep with; and a heart without a head doesn't make a very brilliant dining-room party.

Where The Progressive Thinker flies the motto, "Science, supplemented by an exalted morality, the bible of the future," it is right, eminently so. Nature is all morality, and not religion at all. But nature is not an ideal. She doesn't live on ideals. Man sometimes does. Not all of the spirits have yet outgrown the heart food of the religious ideal, any more than have all of the mortals. Until the test for this kind of aliment shall have been supplemented by a more exalted taste Spiritualism will continue to be, to this extent, a religion.

Anyone would prefer a moral neighbor without religion than a religious one without morality. But, fortunately, there is no one wholly devoid of morality.

When Abe Lincoln was a young man he wrote a pamphlet against the Bible. His friends, seeing he had political prospects, persuaded him not to publish it. His law partner relates the incident. It is not difficult to see that Lincoln was honest from morality more than from religion.

The present is the outgrowth of the past. This is a very sacred truth. It is irreligious not to have profound respect for the terrible and often deadly struggles of the long dark past.

An ideal is a stepping stone to a reality. In science the ideal is not only a strong but is a very useful element. No sooner is one truth tested, proved and established than a new ideal starts the tireless, happy scientist in quest of another truth. Thus the scientist, like all other frail mortals, must have his ideal realms.

The world is still growing.

Spiritualism is not yet out of its struggles. Don't let us strangle it in the borning.

Spiritualism casts a new and stronger light on all the professions, arts, literature, trades, sciences, philosophies, and industries. It is cheap at any price. It is true that it hasn't now as many strong meetings in the towns and cities as thirty years ago. Also thirty years ago didn't see as many strong Spiritualist camp-meetings as now. Its next turn in the spiral evolution will be known when it shall have been reached. Meanwhile we shall continue, as in the past, to learn to do by doing.

Spiritualism is yet full of ideals. These lie in its yet unexplored mysteries. Who can yet tell but that the archangel is not destined to unfold into a being as perfect as the ant and the honey bee; so perfect that he will need no other name for his intelligence than instinct?

Who is yet able to instruct in all the mysteries of mediumship? What a small part of psychology is as yet understood. Psychology is the basis of the present reform in education, and it is yet in its infancy.

Where is the man that can yet give a complete and perfect definition of inspiration?

How much does man know of himself; and how much more is there for him to learn?

What spirit or mortal yet knows the whole truth about obsession?

Who knows what mind is? I have a theory that it is only substance in motion, as mind is air in motion, but how do I know that I am right? I don't know.

Who knows how much or how little truth there is in the words Destiny and Fatalism?

To what extent are spirits guardian angels and mortal guides?

Can mortals thwart spirits more than the reverse?

To what extent is mortal insanity and mortal depravity generally the result of the work of spirits?

How can a Spiritualist training-school ever arrive at full-blown perfection except by starting off with its present light?

Would we now have the wonderful steam engine if Geo. Stevenson hadn't put to use his simple ideas?

Through Spiritualism will not at least one phase of dreams receive a new interpretation?

Is not the term metaphysics better understood than before the days of Spiritualism?

A Science or a Religion.

This is a subject for careful thought, and one worthy of consideration. A casual glance over the field will leave many important points overlooked. In one short article but little can be said one way or the other.

The fact of spirit return, with its attendant phenomena, certainly does not alone furnish a basis of religion, and just as certainly does discover a broad field for scientific investigation. But there are "many men of many minds." While a large per cent of the thinking minds of the day see only the scientific side of the question, others seem to find a religious side, as well; and to a devotional mind it is hard to accept science in place of religion.

To me there is a sacredness found in the phenomena of spirit return and communion not found in the investigations and scientific discoveries of an Edison or a Tesla, but this does not imply a religion, only as Spiritualism stands for humanitarianism.

There are creeds enough without tacking one on to Spiritualism. Leave these to the churches which already are revising and discarding them, and let Spiritualism build upon solid scientific facts a philosophy that no amount of religious thinking can tear down or destroy. MARY WEBB-BAKER.

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

A Religion and a Science not in Compound.

"Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?"

The question seems rather ubiquitous or misleading, since if its "proper position" is in the domain of science it should properly be assigned there. But let us see where its domain may be. By analysis and the signification of terms we have—(See Standard Dictionary,) "Ism—a doctrine or system used to denote a condition, act, idiom doctrine." Therefore, Spiritualism denotes the doctrine of spirit.

The philosophy of Spiritualism is "In cosmogony the doctrine, whether based on reason, sentiment or faith, that there are substances or beings not cognizable to the senses and not revealable through any of the properties of matter, and that are therefore spiritual as distinguished from material:—opposed to materialism."

"Materialize, to assume a material and bodily form."

"Religion is a man's belief in a being or beings mightier than himself and inaccessible to his senses, but not indifferent to his sentiments and actions, with the feelings and actions that flow from such a belief."

"Science (from, scio, to know) knowledge gained and verified by exact observation and correct thinking, exact knowledge of laws, etc. Cause and systematic arrangement of the laws which God has established so far as have been discovered of any department of human knowledge."

Spiritualism or the doctrine of spirit therefore is a philosophy most assuredly, and since it does recognize beings that are superior to, or noncognizant to the senses and not revealed through any of the properties of matter, and that are therefore spiritual, etc. In this degree or interpretation the phenomenal so far as it pertains to evidence has no relation to the philosophy of Spiritualism; it is a misnomer.

That Spiritualism—the ism—or doctrine has a right to take its place among the great religions of the world is assured in the suggestion because of its advocacy of beings mightier than mundane man, and its doctrines admonish and appeal to all to live up to the dictates that such a belief would naturally suggest, of greater purity of purpose, wisdom, justice and progress in order to emulate the higher order of beings, who not only take cognizance of mankind but are not indifferent to his sentiments and actions, and are constantly desirous of seeking through suggestion to lead to higher unfoldment those who are within the radius of their influence.

To me the religious is of the first importance and consideration of all, after the fact of an existence in a superior state and the power to make it known, since the life it teaches has an abiding virtue, while that which comes to us as of the scientific or demonstrable through physics belongs only to the material so far as the phenomenal reaches.

Ergo, the Science, which is to know, is simply a knowledge of the law, and contains no sentiment, but cold inelastic fact, substance, demonstration. It is void of emotion, to be analyzed by the same chemistry or processes as any other science, to be tried and tested and proven like any other. The cosmogony of the science has no part in Spiritualism, more than the electric battery has of sentiment which may be projected through its current. The same chemistry is used to proclaim a disaster or to announce the crowning of a king. The battery is in fact the same, but it is the intelligence or spirit, that something beyond the power of matter, which impels and guides the expression through matter.

The scientific indicator is not the religious phase nor should the phenomenal be classed as a part of the religion of Spiritualism; it has none of its religious or philosophical phases. There should be a division; the scientific and the religious side. The former should be made as scientific and perfect as conformity to and knowledge of cause and laws can make it before dispensing it out to the public, and those who handle it should be required to acquaint themselves with the law as rigidly as those who deal in other sciences, before receiving public patronage, and pass the necessary standard of knowledge and be accredited not as Ministers of the Gospel (heaven save the mark) but as phenomenal scientists or phenomenal mediums. I cannot see the wisdom—nay, truthfulness of proclaiming those used simply to demonstrate a phenomenon as religious teachers, "Ministers of the Gospel," whose practices in Spiritualism(?) are only phenomenal. Why we should confound the two and thus retard the beautiful of Spiritualism is not very clear to me—well, no, it is clear "protection to the medium" humbug.

There is nothing better protected in this or the old countries than science. Make it scientific in its scientific phases—front every fact and demand integrity, turn on the searchlight and discard every faulty wire in the mechanism as every scientist does in his work, search for the minutest cause and law as the astronomer scans the heavens, and purge out all that falls within itself to carry confirmation, and we shall soon possess a school of the grandest and most elevating sciences yet discovered, the study of which will so enlarge our spiritual scope and growth that before we are aware we will be already well on the pilgrimage of our religious ascent.

How many of the so-called Spiritualists of to-day live as conscious of beings mightier than themselves being near who are not indifferent to their sentiments and actions? How many who court the companionship daily of such beings and pare their conclences to their scrutiny honestly and prayerfully seeking to live free from evil thoughts and selfish deeds, so as to be fit companions of or recipients of such guests from the higher domain?

Here is where the religion of Spiritualism, the efficacy of prayer obtains. That uplifting of the spirit which cries out save me, oh save me from myself! save me from temptations, for they are the confessions of my weak nature wherein were I strong I could not be tempted, and only to the strong who are assured of right can peace come. None more than Spiritualists need such prayer, need contrition, need purity of heart, need greatness of purpose, need that baptism of the spirit which is the visible expression of the religious sentiment in the human. Creed is not religion, but there is a religion of humanity which is as beautiful in the name of Spiritualism as another, it is as far reaching as humanity, whose mission is as wide as the valley of tears, as deep as despair, as holy as the ministry of the Gods, who bear on their errands forgiveness to the contrite, joy to the sorrowing, compensation to the silently suffering, rest to the weary hearts, restitution to the sinned against and fallen, peace on earth and good will to all mankind. To do these offices should be the religion of Spiritualism, and the especial mission of the Ministers of the Gospel of Spiritualism. Let us have a religion, and a science as well, but not in compound.

Faithfully thine,

ADDIE L. BALLOU.

SPIRITUALISM.

Is Spirit Return with Its Grand Lessons.

In the short space allotted wherein to state in what class, religious or scientific, Spiritualism ought to be placed, I will as concisely as possible state my views, as it would take columns to properly define religion and science. Spiritualism cannot properly be called a science, as science is defined to-day, whatever it might have been termed by the Grecian bards, for science takes cognizance only of material facts, and even corroborative evidence is not admitted. Physicists may have philosophised on emotional effects, but never on spiritual.

Since Kant made "moral development" a test of religion, distinguished from systems of faith, beliefs, doctrines and rites, the religious idea has taken a far different trend. Fichte made the higher form of speculative knowledge a religion, where man learned how to know self, while Hegel defines his religion as humanitarianism in the absolute, and ignoring modern beliefs and plagiarized systems of faith.

In the early childhood of man, the mighty and mysterious workings of the elements caused fear, and said fear has caused, through past centuries, fetichism, polytheism, hero worship, monotheism, nature worship and the mythologies of the anthropomorphic stage, until we find the God-fearing creeds of our day; which they themselves define as "to fear God, to hold fast to thy faith, by prayers for salvation through a savior, absolute dependence and hope of heaven."

Well may man wonder what constitute a religion, as in Great Britain alone are 170 different sects. But deeming that every thinking man will admit that our span of life here is short compared to an eternity before us, and by natural instinct of self preservation we plan for the future, our present demands here may be pressing, still the vast eternity whither we are all tending ought to be of far greater import, and the shaping of our lives here and our aspirations and inquiries into such future state are our religious thoughts, and our religion.

The word religion is derived from relegere, to read again, or religare, to bind, which does not add any import to what religion really is, as it is proven that it is, first, emotional, and secondly, a philosophy about futurity, in contradistinction from material or physical thinking. The first is an aspirational instinct, the latter a mundane necessity.

Spiritualism is spirit communion, together with its grand lessons derived therefrom; it teaches positivism and fraternity, it inculcates exemplary lives and to cultivate and learn self. It is a traveler's guide and the only real comforter to the sorrowing and this world's unfortunate; and hence, as Spiritualism is emotional, a traveler's unerring guide and a philosophy about futurity, it is a religion, and the highest and grandest religion the world has ever known.

Now in order to organize as a religious body, an unknown God, a fabled Eden, and every unproven tradition and legend must be eliminated, and a twentieth century agnosticism incorporated, where every searcher after absolute truth may draw inspiration under the white banner of mental freedom. The propaganda should not be of the seductive form of proselyting to gain adherents, nor endeavor to make man think other men's thoughts, but that literature which will awaken thoughts be scattered broadcast throughout the world to awaken the unfortunate ones who have heretofore been taught that it was a sin to think.

Wake up the intellectually ignorant and the cowardly, thoughtless ones to the light of to-day, and the spirit world will in the future have less hospitals and dark, gloomy spheres, and our earth will have less tempters from the spirit side of life. We are influenced on every hand by surrounding conditions for a higher or a lesser good; we are influenced by men in and out of the physical form; the very element of joy, song, music, accord and discord proves to us that naught but a positive religion can harmonize these elements, and enable the earthly traveler to clasp hands with the angel hosts in a sacred bond to teach every mortal man to stand upon his own feet, rely upon his own selfhood, and build up his own individuality.

Religious Spiritualism.

My attention with others, has been called to the question, "Shall Spiritualism be recognized as a religion, or shall it be relegated to the realms of science, where it seems so fitted to belong?"

To me this is an almost unnecessary speculation, for first of all as I understand religion, it is an effort to so live, that if there is life beyond the change we must all meet, we will merit happiness, not misery.

It is the hope of that immortal life that has produced the sentiment called religion, and if that hope has no foundation there is no need of religion.

The orthodox churches have taught faith that hope as an incentive to religion, while 'tis true, the elders were made conscious of the fact through the demonstrations of spirit return.

In time scientists took up the investigations of Spiritualism and from their standpoint demonstrated the truth of the claim.

I fail to see why a demonstrated truth should be less an incentive to right living, or a religious life if you will, than the simple hope and faith in that hope.

If it is true that we live with consciousness after we put aside these bodies, and has been so demonstrated by science, is it not necessary for us to live, what all reasoning minds will call a religious life?

An effort to know ourselves, our relation to the Infinite Whole, our responsibilities, and our possibilities?

The fact that Guiteau, who assassinated President Garfield, and Booth, who cruelly murdered President Lincoln, can return to earth and communicate with their friends, and relate their experiences and conditions in spirit life because of misdirected lives in earth, should be a strong argument in favor of spiritualizing men.

This religion does not call for creed, but it does need men and women who have some knowledge of its truth, and can say so, and demonstrate that knowledge by their lives. If life is eternal, give us "religion" in our Spiritualism; if it is not, we do not need either.

RELIGION OF SPIRITUALISM

The Unfolding Principle of Divine Life.

Spiritualism has long ago taken its place among the great religions of the world, and is still there doing its work—working for their destruction. It brings to the world a new religion to fill the places of all the old systems, and new interpretations, definitions, explanations and demonstrations of religion. The principles and ideas that wise spirits have for many years taught on the subject ought to be recognized as the best and highest authority.

The religion of Spiritualism contains no God, no worship, no Devil, no Hell, no Heaven, no Savior, no vicarious atonement, no pardon for sins, no system of salvation, as these doctrines are taught in theology. It is opposed to them and meets them with a square denial.

We are not ready to discard religion because it has been abused and perverted—not ready to drop it from our vocabulary. We want to sift and cleanse this word and cognates from all impurities and rubbish of past ages, and retain it, and give it to the world pure and unadulterated, both by precept and example. We are going to transform it or evolve out of it something pure and beautiful.

In the true sense religion is right living; devotion to truth and duty; goodness; spiritual exaltation; the unfolding principle of divine life; an active principle innate in the human breast, developed by the constant practice of high and noble impulses. It consists in a due exercise of the noble talents descended from the past; a doctrine for a higher knowledge; a principle of right and justice in man's thoughts and acts, and when obeyed it will protect him from crime, corruption, dishonesty; will purify him and destroy habits that are degrading.

Pure religion was the highest knowledge known to the ancients; the true philosophy that unfolds the sentiments and feelings of the heart; an element in the nature and constitution of man, that should be carefully cultivated. From this germ will be unfolded aspirations for peace and harmony, love and happiness, such as a knowledge of the divine laws of harmony and love can ever give.

Spiritualism is a religion to those of a religious nature. It directs us to the importance of a strictly good and righteous life, outlining a plan of right living which in every essential point and attribute means religion. We have with us the facts of verification, while other religions have only the sanction of a misty, confused and questionable antiquity. Our system leads the van of religious thought and freedom of opinion; it is in perfect agreement with science and nature. No other religion or philosophy has demonstrated to us the grand truth of the soul's immortality and its return after death.

Spiritualism annihilates the doctrine of eternal punishment and substitutes the cheering assurance of progression for all. It sweeps away the idea of a personal devil and locates the source of evil in man's own imperfections; affirms that every guilty soul must arise and be his or her own savior—that sin must be abandoned and atoned for by personal suffering and expiation before one can attain complete happiness. Spiritualism is valuable as a science and philosophy, but if its religious element were left out its chief value, beauty and attraction would be gone. With this element included it is a system vital with growth and commensurate with the needs of humanity. It brings you messages from unseen witnesses and brings to your heart that comfort which nothing else in this world can hold or claim and give to you. It is a direct revelation of immortal truth to mankind by intelligent spirits.

There is no antagonism between our religion and science, which is the methodical search for truth, the correct, complete and comprehensive statement of facts. The religion of science recognizes the authority of truth scientifically proved. It does not prescribe ceremonials and rituals, yet it propounds definite doctrines and insists on a rigorous ethical code. It is the fresh proof of immortality—the lever to lift the indifference and skepticism of the age—the balance of power to give to religious liberty the impetus to combat ecclesiastical error.

Spiritualism is the mightiest fact of modern times, and its purpose is to educate, elevate and spiritualize humanity. It embraces spirit communion and faith in and hope of future life, as well as a knowledge of the same. Its cheering light is a comfort and stay to the bereaved such as no other religion or science can give.

Through its revelations we listen not in vain for the answering echoes of weeping love across the chasm of death.

Spiritualism is a revelator, a teacher, a savior that takes its place in society as a religion, to which its claims to a new revelation entitle it. It comes to every life as a blessing in the name of the departed. It is deeply related to life in every department. Ethics or religion is the flower and fruitage of phenomena and philosophy, and it is this ultimatum to which they are all making, for which they are all done, and for which they will be cultivated, studied and experienced from age to age.

The religion of Spiritualism is to be the chief religion of the world when the world unfolds to a comprehension of its principles. It has been often said "religion makes people worse instead of better." That is true of some religions, but is not the case with our system, which, when put into practice, improves people wonderfully. If Christians live lives dishonorable or disgraceful to their profession, it is no good reason why Spiritualists should do so. We can set them an example worthy of emulation.

Each one is free to practice our religion or not, as he or she chooses, without fear of punishment or expulsion from our body. In the line of human responsibility each one is sole judge of her or his own conduct. We take into our congregation all sorts of people, except of them no vows, leave them free, and our purpose is to make them good or better. When evils exist among us, is not the fault of our system, for it puts up every possible bar to evil; and to their hearts as well as heads, reform all who take the spiritual truths home obey the constant call of the angels, "come up higher," for we will never be the wiser, and better for knowledge of which we make no practical application.

Yes, we want religion—can't get along without it, for we are determined to be religious by the methods of our new system. "To be good and do good is our religion." No other word in the English language will fill the place of religion. Ethics will not do it by upwards of a good deal. Some say Altruism is the coming word that will supersede religion; but it will take in both these and still have an abundance of room for more. It is one of the grand departments of Spiritualism, permanently located here. We can consistently sing that good old song:

'Tis religion that can give
Sweetest pleasures while we live;
And religion will supply
Solid comfort when we die.
After death its joys shall be Lasting as eternity.

A. H. NICHOLAS.

SPIRITUALISM.

Religion the Product of Fear.

Can the philosophy of Spiritualism be classified or rated as a religion? It is rather difficult to define religion. Webster's definition is very inadequate and was rather the consequence of strong prejudice in his own mind, as he was one of the strictest of high church Presbyterians. Before Moses was born and thousands of years before the crucifixion of Christ religion existed and the people were blindly devoted to the worship of various gods. Similar to the religious devotees of the present day they based their acts and conduct upon superstitions that are inconsistent with reason and that cannot stand the test of demonstration.

Religion being a product of imagination and fear, when the mind becomes enlightened and the fear removed the prompting to be religious is no longer felt and the emancipated person will cease to be zealously religious. This does not mean that the sense of moral obligation will become extinct, for this may become far more keen in an irreligious person than in one who is oppressed with religious observances. The fact is notorious that some of the most religious persons are the greatest sinners, and it has been the experience of many that they have suffered from those who have been most clamorous in prayer. The "crimes of preachers" stand as proof that familiarity with religious observances is not a very strong restraint against evil doing.

In order to fully consider the relation of Spiritualism to religion it is necessary to examine into the nature and origin of religion itself. In all cases we find it consists in the performance of certain ceremonies that have a relation to an imaginary being or beings that the devotee has conjured up in his own mind and whom he believes are so superior to himself and are possessed of malevolent disposition; and that they—he, or it—are likely to get out of humor and injure the worshiper; so that it is expedient to flatter and make servile obeisance in order to propitiate the conjured deity and persuade him to withhold his wrath and not roast or otherwise abuse his helpless servant. So all religions have their origin in the imagination or fear and these are kept active by the ignorance of the person in regard to the mystery of life and the destiny of the soul. These facts will cover all the religions that are now or have ever been in existence.

Now when we examine the subject of Spiritualism we find that it has none of the features or characteristics that have given cause to or that sustain religion. It does not start out either as predicating or rejecting a god. What it seeks to discover are the facts that appertain to meta-gnosticism—the beyond knowledge; or the kind of existence that may be encountered beyond the temporary earth life. It first assumes that the organized intelligences that have had a birth in and an experience in earth life yet endure; that they do not become extinct at the throwing off of the body; and that it is possible to open communication with these intelligent human entities and ascertain in what manner they survive and what conditions await those who are yet passing through earth life. By various trials and by subscribing to requisite conditions such spirit communication has been established, and the existence of these decarnated souls has been repeatedly demonstrated, and the information of their surroundings and their methods of being have been transmitted to us. In all this there has been no worship demanded, and nothing similar to religion has been performed; unless the harmonizing influence of music, that is so potent in opening the avenues of love and rendering possible the converse of two worlds, may be so construed.

No religion can be substituted for what can be accomplished in these efforts of spiritual intercourse. They transcend every thing that the nature of religion can supply. The knowledge they bring of nature and existence is above all religion. It stands dumb and discomfited before the soul-satisfying tidings of spiritual science. All the superstitions and vain imaginings of priests and craven devotees are superseded by the new illumination whose refulgent rays banish the terrors of the tomb. Spiritualism, vestured in her white robes of truth, sits enthroned high above all religion; the culmination of the ages and the hope of mankind.

SPIRITUALISM:

It Is Both Religious and Scientific.

Should Spiritualism be called a religion or a science?

The above question is an ever-recurring one among our ranks and a frequent source of trouble or dissension among our members. A better way to put the question, to my mind, would be thus: "Shall Spiritualism be a progressive, humanitarian, reformatory, uplifting force among mortals, or shall it simply be a matter to be scientifically tested every day, and tested over again the next day to see if the first test was really a test or not?

One definition given to the word religion by our best authorities is "a sense of the unseen and spiritual," that is to say to be satisfied of the existence of higher powers or intelligences in other planes of life than the one in which we live and move and have our being. To be conscious of a power which is uplifting and capable of educating us upon many vital questions pertaining to the welfare of humanity on both sides of life is certainly akin to religious feelings or sentiments.

Thomas Paine defined religion in a very simple yet beautiful phrase which ought to be framed in the most artistic manner and hung in the home of every true Spiritualist in the world: "The world is my country, to do good is my religion."

Surely every Spiritualist ought to be able to endorse that beautiful sentiment, if they do not I fear they have only been test-hunting all the time, and have never come to a realization of the grand truth of human brotherhood which the higher influences are seeking to establish upon the earth or rather bring into actual, positive manifestation.

The scientific Spiritualist, as far as I can see, cares nothing for the ethical and humanitarian teachings of our philosophy, cares nothing for active public work in educating the people in the principles of our grand philosophy, but treats the whole subject as simply a matter for his own amusement or satisfaction. He investigates phenomena all the time in private, generally keeping his knowledge to himself and like Vanderbilt is reported to have said on one occasion, he thinks, "the public be damned."

I once gave the following question to a prominent medium who holds regular meetings in Chicago: "What good will Spiritualism do for the world?" The answer was, "Spiritualism didn't come to the world for that purpose, at all," and the medium went on with a mixed-up harangue which I did not understand at all.

As far as I am concerned, if Spiritualism doesn't contain some elements for the betterment of humanity, I think we had better let the whole matter drop. If it does, then it is both religious and scientific, and we should have the privilege of calling it either as we may feel disposed.

The objection has been raised that some ideas have been taught or advanced from our rostrums that are not universally considered for the best interests of humanity. For instance, the present marriage system has been severely criticized and ideas have been advanced hoping to help solve one of the most important yet most difficult of questions.

Granted that some of these ideas may have been too radical, yet they were probably given with the best of intentions, and no one who studies the conditions of life as they exist to-day in our large cities will doubt for one moment the necessity for some radical change in the marriage system.

Anything which comes from the spirit side of life which will better the conditions of life in any way is a good work and therefore is a religious work. The same sentiment which prompts a few well educated, refined ladies and gentlemen to do slum work in our large cities, to relieve suffering and sorrowing humanity, in the best way they can, also prompts highly developed spirits to come to the earth plane or send thought vibrations to help solve the difficult questions which we have to take our part in solving. Then why relegate these influences and their much-needed help to the background by simply making it a subject for scientific test-hunting? Why confine spiritual work entirely to private seances and circles? Why try to keep down any organization for public work, for teaching humanitarian ways of living and cultivating the spirit of human brotherhood?

SCIENCE OF LIFE.

The Status of Modern Spiritualism.

The exact status of Modern Spiritualism as a movement can hardly be determined as a movement can hardly be determent is still in a chaotic condition, and will remain so, in the writer's opinion, for some time to come. While it is true that we have a National organization, with tributaries all over the Union, for the purpose of centralizing the movement as a distinct body, to take its place among the great religions of the world, the true object of organization has been obscured by a tendency to cater too much to the popular conception of what constitutes a great religion.

The psychological effect of so-called religious worship, that has dominated the human race since its early history, when designing minds banded together and claimed authority over man's natural tendencies to worship his superior, still holds sway within the Spiritualistic ranks and cramps the great and real purpose of the N. S. A., i. e., to centralize and unite the Spiritualists of the nation as a body for self-protection as a reform movement against all opposition Human history proves that all religious reformers, individually or collectively, have never achieved their objects without the greatest opposition of that class of men who have always claimed authority over man's spiritual aspirations.

Modern Spiritualism as a religious reform movement has not yet experienced the fully organized opposition of ecclesiastic hierarchy as a body. While the movement and its expounders have been attacked again and again by Christian ministers, the full force of opposition against this modern heretic is still held in reserve by the Christian church, but will be applied at the proper time.

It is very well to speak of altruism as the essential factor to advance Modern Spiritualism, but where do we find it?

Perhaps we may see it lived in the lives of a few individuals who have spiritually advanced by the force of circumstances, but Spiritualists as a class are not on a higher plane spiritually than our good Christian friends.

It would be wise, I think, not to deceive ourselves relative to the exact status of Modern Spiritualism. While it is desirable to incorporate altruism as one of the essentials of Modern Spiritualism, the most needed factor in our movement is the scientific foundation of our claims.

The Christian church will never permit Modern Spiritualism to become popular or prominent as a religious movement, as it would indeed be suicidal to their position as the dominant factor in the realm of man's soul.

It is to material science that Modern Spiritualism must look for support, if it does not want to be exterminated as a distinct reform movement.

Our movement needs more systematic scientific efforts to reduce the phenomena to a scientific study upon principles that will not repel material science, but will harmonize with or recognize the achieved results of advanced thinkers allied to material science.

Our N. S. A. and our local societies need a scientific department for the systematic study of our phenomena upon scientific lines, and then we may build upon solid facts that cannot be gainsaid.

Having concentrated our efforts in this direction, our movement will make a new start and be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science.

Modern Spiritualism once recognized as the science of life here and hereafter, will make rapid strides and its philosophy will then be fittingly recognized as resting upon the rock of ages (science), and not upon human ignorance and superstition.

Summarizing in a few words our observations, it seems to the writer, that we ought to have less religion and more science, or in other words, a scientific religion, that will teach us how to live in harmony with the physical and spiritual laws of the universe.

DEFINITIONS.

Religion Naught but Superstition.

My Spiritualism antedates the Rochester knockings. "Nature's Divine Revelations," by Andrew Jackson Davis, the seer, converted me in 1847. I soon made his acquaintance, and when he instituted a spiritual society in New York City I co-operated with him. He was manager and sole lecturer. I never heard him make an "invocation."

Coming out of the orthodox church, I naturally retained religious sentiments. These by degrees passed away, and long ago I became convinced that religion in its last analysis is naught but superstition. Hence I cannot consider Spiritualism a religion.

Religion has always been a disturbing element. The founders of our government sought to exclude it. But it is ever bound to dominate in civil affairs. Little by little it has insinuated itself in this government, until now churchmen boldly declare that no man could be elected President of the United States to-day who is an avowed opponent of Christianity." I believe that is true, and I even doubt whether a President can hereafter be elected who is not a church-member.

The best definition of religion ever given, in my judgment, was by Col. J. C. Smith, some months ago in The Progressive Thinker, to-wit: "Human effort to obtain Divine favor." Col. Smith, like myself, was in youth a church member. He was ducked and I was sprinkled. When Dr. Mahew, president of the Spiritual Society in Washington, D. C., sought to adopt a long creed, Col. Smith adroitly defeated it by moving as a substitute a short one, declaring that the society repudiated the free-love doctrines of Mrs. Woodhull, then president of the National Society. This was the chief article in the long creed proposed by Dr. Mahew. But the defeat so offended him that he resigned at once and for many years thereafter would not attend the meetings. Col. Smith succeeded Dr. Mahew as president, and the only avowed free-lover of the board of managers when he came into the presidency, resigned.

Ecclesiasticism is conservative, and a conservative is facetiously defined as "one who, having got into hot water, will not get out lest he be scalded." Human nature is the same in all ages. "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be."

The only organization I now belong to is the Geographic Society, for which I get a quid pro quo in lectures and publications; and there is no religion in geography. The tendency of all organizations is to grow worse with age, and if I find the Geographic Society getting intolerable, I will quit it.

"Society in every state is a blessing; government in its best estate is but a necessary evil." So said Thomas Paine, and I will add that most organizations are unnecessary evils. Co-operation without combination is my doctrine.

WM. HENRY BURR.

Science, Not Religion.

Your ugestion, "Is Spiritualism a religion or a science?" has my vote that it is a science. Years ago, I saw, heard and felt, in a manner which would make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which, by a mind capable of judgment cannot be taken to be impostures which have been explained by any system known except that called Spiritualism, therefore Spiritualism is a science. Until the theory, or rather facts called Spiritualism are explained on any other basis, till then I am in favor of Spiritualism as science, not religion.

In all nature there is a mystery to ordinary minds, on the same plan as we find in various phenomena called Spiritualism. This also is a good reason that Spiritualism should be classed as a science, and not a thing to worship. A louse might manifes as a spirit; should we worship the louse as a god or thing to be called divine?

Spiritualism is a fact to any one who has a judicial mind, one that can judge a thing by evidence, as a judge in a court of justice judges, or a jury finds a person innocent or guilty according to the evidence; this can be known to anyone who takes time to investigate, or study evidence on this subject.

By Spiritualism, I mean the doctrine of the existence of spirit as distinct from matter; the knowledge that disembodied spirits can and do communicate with the living; also the various ideas, founded on facts, experience and knowledge. Spiritualism proves a continued individual intelligence of the thinking part of animal forms after the process usually called death.

What is science? Science is knowledge; comprehension of, understanding of facts or principles. Knowledge gained by systematic observation, experiment, and reasoning; knowledge arranged; also, the search of truth as thus known.

Spiritualism is no more a worship than mathematics, our birth or our bodily death. Such is my opinion and knowledge.

I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. 'Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., FEB. 22, 1902. NO. 639.

A SUGGESTIVE SYMPOSIUM.

Spiritualism as Located by Its Master Minds.

Its Exact Status Clearly and Comprehensively Defined.

And in Such a Variety of Ways that Each Reader Can Find Something to His Liking.

A Multitude of Answers to a Circular Letter. (Continued from Last Week.)

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION

SHOULD SPIRITUALISM TAKE ITS PLACE AMONG THE GREAT RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD, OR BE ASSIGNED TO ITS PROPER POSITION IN THE DOMAIN OF SCIENCE?

Dear Sir:—Spiritualism has assumed special prominence throughout the world, and to-day the question naturally arises, what is its exact status, considered from a religious, philosophical or scientific standpoint? The fact that spirits do return to earth and rap on tables, write on slates, engage in endless contradictions in regard to things material and spiritual, speak in audible voices, paint portraits, mislead some badly and direct others aright, and do hundreds of other remarkable things—some good and some bad—has received world-wide recognition. All the phenomena thus recognized have been grouped together, and the general name, Spiritualism, applied thereto to represent the body or class of people who believe in the same.

Whether the phenomena, the direct result of spirit intercourse, should become the foundation of a new creed, a new sect, a system of worship, or the basis of a religious cult, or should simply be recognized as a scientific fact and treated exclusively as such, just as any new discovery always is, and no more sacred than any other phenomenon brought to light in the natural world, is a question you are called upon to consider. Whether Spiritualism should take its place among the great religions of the world, or the cause of its phenomena be assigned to a place in the domain of science, by the side of the wonderful achievements of Edison, Tesla and others, is a question of deep and significant import.

To-day the tendency is to make a religion of Spiritualism, and to promote that end, societies have been organized, and meetings open with singing and prayer, just as the orthodox churches do. Mediums have been regarded as ministers of the gospel, and are regarded as such when they apply for half-fare on railroads.

There are, however, a large class of intelligent and influential people who regard spirit communion as a scientific fact—that and nothing else—and they will explain the method of communication from a scientific standpoint, just as the scientist will explain how a message is transmitted by telephone or wire. They fail to understand why a religion should be formulated from the fact that Guiteau, who assassinated President Garfield, or Booth, who cruelly murdered President Lincoln, can return to earth and communicate with their friends. In truth, they cannot comprehend why a conversation carried on between the two realms, whether the spirits be exceptionally wise or good, or low and debased, shall become the basis of a religious cult, when apparently it belongs exclusively to the domain of science.

The fact is, spirit phenomena cannot be patented or copyrighted. Rev. John Wesley, a devout man, has related some startling experiences with spirits in his own family, long before the rappings occurred at Hydesville, N. Y. The Catholic church abounds in incidents where spirits have returned to earth, still determined to keep the world creedbound. The Mormons boast of the angels coming to them direct. In China, too, spirit communion is common. All through past history there is evidence that spirits have communicated with those left on earth. The method by which they communicate with mortals is in accordance with a natural law, using certain agencies connected therewith, just as the mechanic uses certain methods to construct a telephone, an engine, a magnetic battery, or a telegraphic line between two distant cities. One can not get out of the domain of law, and the question is whether that which is purely natural, purely in accordance with the forces in the natural and spiritual planes, should become the foundation of a religion, or whether it should be assigned to the domain of science, the same as any other scientific fact. We ask you to express your views in regard to the matter.

SPIRITUALISM

Rests on a Solid Basis of Facts and Demonstrations.

The term "Spiritualism" is a misnomer, when applied to the discovery that intercourse is possible between men of earth and men who have emigrated from it. Scholars like Fishbough, Brittan, Courtney, Gray and Mapes should have protested against such baptism, and furnished a name significant of its character. What that name should have been, I will not assume to state. "Incarnate" (covered with flesh), seems an appropriate title for an inhabitant of earth, and "decarnate" (without flesh), though not entirely satisfactory, might be made to represent a man who has left his flesh and become an inhabitant of another state or place of existence.

Spirit from "Spirito" (wind) is not expressive of intercourse between incarnate and decarnate men. In fact as applied to man in any condition, the title is an absurdity. Superstition, however, and custom-made dictionaries, have clothed it in a regalia of words and definitions so elaborate, that we are compelled to regard it as meaning a human being who does not live on earth.

It was with this view, perhaps, that the fathers tolerated the name Spiritualism. They regard the matter, probably, as black Sam Johnson did his family nomenclature. He had a daughter called "Tremendous." A friend of mine asked him why he had given the girl so strange a name. "Well, de fac is," replied he, "I seed de name in a book, and de name pleased me, so I drapped it on de chile."

But whether proper or otherwise the legacy is ours, and obvious duty commands us to ennoble it.

Spiritualism is furthermore encumbered by the association of such words as souls, ghosts and angels, all meaningless, and should never be used except in recounting the ignorance and superstition of our ancestors.

What the term soul really means is an insoluble problem. Many people, however, treat it as indicating a portion of man's outfit, an unknown something among his possessions which requires great care and vigilance to prevent its loss. It is also made to serve as a vicarious sufferer for its owner's misdeeds. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul," indicates perhaps that in case his soul be lost or strayed beyond reclamation, he would have no scapegoat and be obliged to suffer in his own person for offenses. In former days it was believed that men held their souls as subjects for barter, and if we might believe tradition, man and the devil once carried on an extensive commerce in the article. Of course in all such transactions the devil was cheated. But really there is no evidence tending to show there is such a thing as a soul, on earth or elsewhere. If I had wealth I would offer a large reward for the production of a man who has ever seen, heard, felt smelled or tasted a soul, ghost or angel, disconnected with a human form. In all our literature I do not recollect of reading of but one man who ever pretended he had seen a soul, and he was the blustering, lying Falstaff.

Boy—"Do you not remember a saw, a flea, stick upon Bardolph's nose and a said it was a black soul burning in hell."—King Henry V.

Angel, from the Greek "angelos," means messenger only, but poetry and legend have made it represent a being superior to man, equipped with a flying apparatus that is rendered useless by the absence of guiding plumage. Thousands and thousands of living human beings have been seen, felt and heard whose earthly bodies were mouldering in cemeteries and elsewhere. Indeed all our senses give evidence of the reality of decarnate existence.

Mention is made of ghosts quite often, but when seen they always bear a human form. Christian teachers also talk flippantly about a being called the Holy (or excellent) Ghost, supposed to be junior partner in a great firm. In my supposititious offer of a reward, the discovery of this being should also be included.

Spiritualism then consists in intercourse between living men and living men, while one is in an incarnate and the other a decarnate condition of life. The discovery is about half a century old and was, I believe, the most important event in history.

We cannot deny that much of this intercourse is crass and rude. Yet we know that in other portions it is refined, ethical, and sublime. As a whole it is a grand overshadowing fact. Spiritualism need never tax the imaginations of its adherents for mythic forms to awaken rhapsody. In the glow and radiance of its sublime realities there is poetry and song enough for all. Angels and souls belong to fable and are not required in the melodies of actual life. The Spiritualist stands on solid earth with upward look, denoting his grand character of anthropoi. He has cast away the crutches of conjecture and buried the barnacles of theology. His eyes are closed to the cant of vicarious atonement, while the gossip about saving faith awakens only smiles. He knows faith to be merely belief, and that the surplus of the article called great faith is but an exaggerated estimate of an opinion.

Of the ethics and theology of Spiritualism I can only say that in my judgment it possesses neither. The teachers of Spiritualism, however, are better equipped for imparting ethical knowledge than those of a religious cult, for in addition to what other teachers know they have access to the wisdom and experience of men who inhabit the spiritual worlds.

Religion consists in man's efforts to please gods and establish friendly relations with them, or in less words it consists in human efforts to obtain divine favors.

There cannot be found in history a religion without a God. Some divine being is the axle around which it revolves. Its leading idea, its central thought, its motive power. Religion is as inseparable from a God, as fire and heat, air and wind.

Religious practices were common on the earth at the dawn of history, and probably were known when man fought with the cave bear for the possession of his rocky shelter; man at that time being the most ferocious beast of the two.

From this fact religionists claim that man is naturally a religious animal. I do not see that the conclusion is justified. At that time man was dressed in his own hair and ornamented with a tail. Like his descendants also, he had fear and selfishness, which led him to regard phenomena he did not understand as being divinities that might be placated and induced to bestow favors in exchange for his offerings. If religion were actually natural with man we might expect to hear infants shout "Glory to God" among their first attempts at speech. Such a thing was never witnessed. I remember a little boy, my own, whose first effort was "goo, goo," his second "by, by," his third "ma, ma," and his fourth, when I had exploded some fire-crackers near him, "dam it!"

We are next told by our religious teachers that religion is of such great antiquity that it has become sanctified by time. Let us see. Our forefather's first appearance in full dress was when he had wrapped himself in the skin of an animal. Should sanctification or any other thing limit our wardrobe to such a garment? Our ancestors were pirates and robbers; does duty compel us to follow that example?

There is nothing in that argument for a religionist. If anything, the fact of antiquity shows practices to be avoided. If early man was religious we should not be. As a rule, if we find a custom to be very old, we must conclude it is very bad. This rule is justified by literature. The older an authorship is, the more vicious it is found to be. Take for example the "Iliad" and "Eneid." What are they but a succession of recounted crimes? Aggregations of barbarism and slaughter? As I live, I do not know of a book written more than a century and a half ago that is worth reading. The so-called ancient histories are fabulous and justify Robert Burns' statement:

"Some books are lies frae end to end."

When Tacitus called Josephus a liar and coward, he doubtless spoke the truth and the same epithet is applicable to Tacitus himself. Herodotus pretended that he wrote to "rescue from oblivion the memory of great events," and then filled his pages with accounts of feather stories, nations of amazons and watchful griffins.

Never attempt to prove the truthfulness of any tale by its antiquity, for as we trace events backwards they are found to increase in vileness with every step. The truth is, our earth is just commencing to be a fit place for human habitation. In making it such, examples set by youthful men have one by one been abandoned, until now the practical rule is, whatever was done by boyish man, mature man should not do.

What the first religious rites were is unknown, but those which archeology has discovered appear to be the butchery of animals and roasting their bodies on burning logs and heated stones. The men who did the killing and roasting were known as priests. The people who gave the animals and the priests who practiced the ceremony were undoubtedly sincere in the belief that their God would be pleased with these acts and bless them in return. I notice, however, in the sequel, all the roasted meats became the property of the priests, and the God's portion was restricted to the smell. And this reminds me that even the Jewish God, our God, is declared to be fond of such odors. See Gen. 8th and 9th chapters.

The sacrifice of human beings was also one of the early efforts of man to place himself on good terms with gods. The priests who killed and burned the victims must have possessed zeal that bordered on insanity, together with nerves of steel to enable them to play their parts in the horrible tragedies. Only a superficial faith is required when a priest makes a prayer in words, but to plunge a dagger in the breast of an innocent man or woman and then cast the palpitating body on livid coals as an act of duty, is an exhibition of immeasurable faith. That was religion forced to the very zenith of devotion.

These acts were followed by asceticism, chastisement of self, and self-torture. Simeon Stylites sat thirty years upon a stump in a cheerless desert to secure God's favor. The Christian church deemed that conduct highly religious and placed his name in the calendar of saints.

Monasteries were next provided in which grown-up men, called monks, devoted their time to religious studies, prayers and reveries, and where they followed austere rules that prohibited the use of water except as a beverage. Piety and nastiness with them were deemed synonymous terms.

"You call my fingers nasty," said the old priest, "you ought to see my toes."

Nunneries were also built in large numbers and densely filled. They were designed to hide women from the world, that their devotion to God might be more fully assured. Their usual provision for personal cleanliness was the corner of a wet towel once a week.

Next came the Inquisition, torture chambers, stakes for burning heretics, thumb-screws, racks and hideous dungeons, all religious. Great wars, too, like the Crusades, the thirty years of Flanders—against the Waldenses, Albigenses and Huguenots, Bartholomew massacres and heartless persecutions until religion in Europe shed blood sufficient to float a navy. The thousand years of gloom called the "Dark Ages" showed religion in its glory. God and the priesthood governed all; possessed all. It really appeared that civilized man, so-called, was about to retrace his steps and assume again the garb of the savage with augmented ignorance. This fate was only prevented by the fortunate discovery of the printing art.

The light and knowledge spread by that invention, together with the discovery of America forty years after, slowly turned a portion of man's thoughts from religion to man himself. He actually began to think with some degree of independence, and when Luther proclaimed the right of mankind to make its own religious forms and exercise its own judgment without priestly supervision, great masses became his followers. The reformation, however, was not a religious act. It was an insurrection against religion. The results were good. The church lessened its tyranny, death and torture for unbelievers were abolished, penances were made less severe, and religion as a whole became more decent. Protestantism led the way and Catholicism followed until from bloody barbarism religion reached the borders of buffoonery; and there it remains to-day.

Excepting the support of a vast army of men called priests and ministers, in exchange for a short speech or two by each, weekly, and a few minutes devoted to giving advice to God by way of prayer, the Christian religion of 1902 is a monstrous farce. It consists of a few half-tenanted and half-exposed nunneries, masses, prayers in Latin and other tongues, incense-burning, baptisms, psalm-singing, music with slow movement—hence sacred—church attendance, blessings over contribution boxes bead counting, holy-water, Sunday-Schools, and eating bread and drinking wine—playing them to be God's blood and body.

There is also a hypnotic experience called "getting religion," and which is sometimes beneficial. If the suggestion of the priest be strong enough to create a permanent resolution in the subject's mind to lead a better life, the effort is good—although we notice in that case the converted man loses a portion of his desire for intellectual culture and becomes too often bigoted, morose and tyrannical. The example of Isaac Watts will serve to illustrate my meaning. Before that experience he wrote:

"Two kindred souls alone should meet,
'Tis friendship makes the bondage sweet:
And feeds their mutual loves:
Bright Venus on her rolling throne
Is drawn by gentlest birds alone,
And cupid yokes the doves."

After that experience he could write:

"Behold the aged sinner goes,
Laden with the guilt and mighty woes,
Down to the regions of the dead,
With endless curses on his head."

But I hear the claim made that religion, especially the Christian religion, teaches a high grade of morality. This is an error. Instead of a high grade of ethics, it teaches nothing whatever. It is a matter between God and man, and not between man and his fellows. The teachers of religion, or rather the men who serve as its priests and ministers, teach morality, and to their credit be it said, many of them prove earnest and valuable instructors. Large numbers of our race have undoubtedly been induced to lead peaceful, moral lives by instruction received from pulpits. But that is not religion. Let us take the case of Jesus of Nazareth to illustrate. Whether historical or ideal, the character is the same. He did not mention religion in all his teachings, and the only attention he gave to it was to be baptized by John. His prayers were few, and in the one reported as a sample are found but two or three modest requests. His life was spent among the most bigoted and religious people on earth, but he joined in none of their ceremonies. The passover he seemed willing to keep as a memorial service and not a religious one. In other words, he was not a religious man in any true sense of the term. He was a reformer, and his teachings may be summed up as moral apothegms. He taught practical goodness, while the Jewish priests, his enemies, taught religion.

SUMMARY.

Spiritualism is actual intercourse between man and man, one of whom is decarnate.

Religion is a hypothetical intercourse between man and gods.

Spiritualism rests on facts and demonstration.

Religion rests on faith and conjecture.

Spiritualism is devoted to man only.

Religion is devoted to gods.

Spiritualism, like air and sunshine, is a priceless gift.

Religion is a prodigious tax and burden on the resources of mankind.

I wish some competent scholar like W. H. Burr, of Washington, would make a catalogue of religion, and that a good artist like some of those who control the Bangs Sisters would illustrate that catalogue on canvas. A picture that would at one end show human sacrifices succeeded by the various rites and ceremonies of religion as scheduled and ending with a communion table scene, where the guests nibble baked paste and wash it down with sips of grape juice, would cast more light upon religion than a hundred lectures.

I would also like to have such a man as Lyman C. Howe or Hudson Tuttle describe Spiritualism in such form that an artist could paint it. I suggest that it represent a grand highway leading from earth to a succession of gorgeous spheres—said highway to be equipped with proper stations where men incarnate and men decarnate may meet, confer, give and receive instruction and adopt measures for the advancement and happiness of mankind.

When provided with these two paintings the Spiritualist teacher may safely call on his audience to "look on this picture—then on that." The listener's lips will part and the shout "Hyperion to a Satyr" burst from every pair.

There is one more subject to which I must refer. In case we declare Spiritualism is not a religion, our itinerants will lose two things, namely: half-fare rates on railroads and the title of "Reverend."

I am aware it is dangerous to disturb a bear with cubs, and shall expect some visitations from sharp claws when I declare that no dust will be laid by my tears if those half-fares and titles are abolished. Both are religious and invented as aids to religion. Half-fares for preachers serve as blind taxes on the traveling public, and the titles if not wicked are absurdly inappropriate. If the hundred thousand ministers of our land were compelled to pay the same rate for transportation other people do, lighter charges would follow for all, without lessening the dividend funds.

It is evident from the Bible that the God who it is claimed inspired it, has a prudent regard for his prerogatives. Events which we should scarcely expect might attract his notice have sometimes aroused his anger and provoked summary punishment—as for example, the building of the town on the plains of Shinar.

Now the word "Reverend" is employed in the Bible as one of God's names, and is not used for any other purpose whatever. "Holy and reverend is his name." We might expect in view of God's character as set forth in the Bible, that a man who would call himself by that name would at least be kicked over the garden wall for his audacity and presumption. But the clergy sometimes act as though they believed the appropriation of that name was on their part a condescension. Yet they enjoy it hugely. They revel in it. A priest they call "Reverend," a dean "Very Reverend," a bishop "Right Reverend," and an archbishop "Most Reverend."

None can diagnose the future with certainty, but judging from past exhibitions of priestly humility, it seems possible that these close-shaved gentlemen may yet assume all the other names of the Deity—Jehovah, Zeus, Jupiter—and by this "benevolent assimilation" guard the lustre of God's names from tarnish or obscurity by the grandeur of their own.

I suggest that we give our teachers the honorable and appropriate title of "Professors."

DEAN CLARKE'S OPINION

That Spiritualism Is a Religion.

To the Editor:—In reply to your circular letter asking my views as to whether Modern Spiritualism should be classed as a science or a religion, I unhesitatingly reply that my Spiritualism is a scientific and philosophical religion. If, however, Spiritualism is defined to mean no more than the term Spiritualism legitimately embraces, viz.—a knowledge of spirit phenomena, and the laws governing them, together with the practice of communicating with spirits for secular, selfish ends, as is now much in vogue, this I admit does not constitute a religion. Test-giving, fortune-telling, materializing, or producing the whole range of physical phenomena, and perhaps I may include mental phenomena as well, are not religion; nor strictly speaking, are they religious exercises. But they are not the ALL of Spiritualism. It has a "higher aspect," and a wide signification. It purely is a science and philosophy of life here and hereafter. In its analysis of universal phenomena it goes back of all the physical manifestations of Nature herself, and recognizes Infinite Spirit as the Primary Intelligent Force—"The Great First Cause" of universal motion, life, organization, and of individual intelligence.

Recognizing man as essentially a spirit, clothed with a modicum of the matter of which the universe is composed, it predicates his origin as a spirit, in the Infinite Spirit pervading all matter. In other words, it traces man's outer and inner bodies to Nature's vast storehouse of material elements, and by parity of reasoning, it must needs trace his spiritual being or ego, to the all-pervading Spirit of Nature. Where else could he come from, as a whole?

The true Spiritualist scientist and philosopher, must then "see God" manifest in nature and in himself, or he stops short of all causation, and fails to find a rational explanation of all cosmic processes, and of individual life and intelligence. Why is it not as reasonable to conclude that Nature has a soul, as that man's body has? I am unable to see why Theism or Pantheism is not as well proven by all natural phenomena, as is Physiology by the functions of animal bodies, or as well as Spiritualism is by its physical manifestations. Surely the same logic which proves that "there is a spirit in man," proves that there is a Universal Spirit in Nature whence man has derived all that he has, and is. Spiritualism, then, as a science and philosophy, or, if you prefer, as a scientific philosophy, sees God everywhere manifest in atom, star, and sun, and as reverence is a natural attribute of all spiritually unfolded minds, as rational Spiritualists,

We worship God at Nature's shrine
Wherein we find the Life Divine;
Her forces are His life and soul
Whose boundless Being is THE WHOLE.

Therefore we do not predicate our religion, as the Editor's circular implies, simply, or solely upon "phenomena the direct result of spirit intercourse," though we may be greatly aided in our religious evolution by intercourse with exalted spirits, who teach Natural Religion, as nearly all of them do.

Pure and undefiled Spiritualism possesses more of the elements of true religion than any other cult extant. It teaches the spirituality of Nature and of man, as heretofore shown; it demonstrates an eternal progressive life for all mankind, it reveals the great law of eternal justice—of compensation and retribution—that "we reap as we sow; it teaches and insists upon practical altruism in all human relations; its code of ethics is the Golden Rule, which is based upon the spiritual unity and brotherhood of humanity that it scientifically proves; it opens to all the source of inspiration, revelation, and spiritual baptism; it reveals the true Heaven and Hell as states of mind and conditions of spirit—the sequences of our thoughts and deeds; it proves the immanence of the spirit world, and the watchful guardianship of ministering spirits, and it is the greatest "Comforter" the world has ever had; its Bible, replete with divine truth, revealed by science, explained by philosophy, and interpreted by reason, is Nature; last and greatest, its God—the Infinite Spirit "that is one whom all devout souls may "worship in spirit and in truth," without ritual, form, or ceremony. Why then object to a rational religion formed of elements such as these, and stated, if you like, in a creed containing only axioms and demonstrated truths? A religion without a creed defining its principles, is an air-castle, liable to be wrecked by every "wind of doctrine" that sophists may raise against it.

"Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, and operates unspent,"

Truly, I see no good reason why Spiritualism may not "take its place among the great religions of the world," as properly as that its phenomena "should be assigned their proper place in the domain of science," as our Editor suggests. It is the glory of Spiritualism, as a religion, that it rests upon a scientific basis.

Science becomes the "handmaid of religion," by leading thinking minds to "look through Nature up to Nature's God," as before shown.

Regarding the Universe as a stupendous spirit materialization, what spiritually quickened mind can gaze upon the grand old Earth with its myriads of forms of majesty, grandeur, and beauty, or glance at the starry heavens gleaming with glory incomprehensible, without agreeing with one who wrote: "An undevout astronomer [and Spiritual Scientist, I add] must be mad." The unpleasant fact is that mere phenomenal Spiritists are as little versed in the true spirit of science and philosophy as they are in the spirituality of Spiritualism. They need to ponder the sayings of Pope:

"A little knowledge is a dangerous thing,
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring."

Merely witnessing phenomena, and communicating through them with "familiar spirits," usually does not unfold the moral and religious faculties of the "test fiend," or the superficial investigator. They must enter the Sanctum Sanctorum of the great Spiritual Temple, where they can commune with Angels of Wisdom, and receive a higher and purer Spiritual baptism, ere they can feel the divine inspirations which vibrate from the Great "Soul of Things," and awaken devout and worshipful feelings.

In conclusion, I believe Spiritualism is, rightly understood and presented, just the elastic, rational religion that all progressive souls demand, and that it is only a question of time, and of humanity's mental and spiritual growth, when it will supplant all other systems, and march to the Empire of All the World!

ALTRUISTIC RELIGION.

In Harmony with Natural Laws and Science.

All of the so-called religions of the world have had their origin in some occult manifestation of ordinarily invisible powers either real or pretended. Such manifestations were considered by the ignorant and superstitious, the work of God. A selfish and too often unscrupulous priesthood in all ages have made the belief in such things a source of revenue and power, and to a certain extent are still doing so. Not till near the middle of the nineteenth century did the real source of such phenomena become known, through the gifts of such seers as A. J. Davis, John Brown, the medium of the Rockies, and finally the Fox girls and a host of mediums in all parts of the civilized world.

Modern Spiritualism with its great variety of manifestations came at a time when the general diffusion of education and knowledge had prepared many minds for a more intelligent and scientific analysis of the causes that were producing the startling phenomena. The old cry of witchcraft and satanic influence had lost much of its power, with the result that millions of intelligent people have accepted the general facts of Spiritualism, which prove that we have a continued existence beyond our earthly pilgrimage.

If the various beliefs with regard to a future existence and the relation that this life bears to that future and to the ruling powers that have been accredited with having control and authority over that existence, are properly termed religion, then I do not see why Spiritualism should not also be called a religion. To be sure, Spiritualism is not a religion which admits of monopolistic control. No priest can get possession of the door that opens to a higher, purer, more refined existence, and make a charge for admission.

Immortality is the heritage of all, and when this fact is accepted as taught by our spirit friends, the profession of the priest as a mediator between man and the higher powers is really a thing of the past. The preacher is out of a job. No wonder that the clergy have been so bitter in their opposition to a philosophy that threatens to take away their means of livelihood. They have been living on the fat of the land and are unwilling to give up so profitable a calling.

Many of the phenomena that go to prove a future existence and the possibility of our spirit friends being able to return and communicate with us, are as thoroughly proven as the accepted facts of science, and are so considered by many of the most noted scientists of the present time. During the last twenty-five years, there has seldom a day passed that I have not received some kind of communication, signal or warning, from my spirit friends when all alone, bringing intelligence that has often been of great value to me, and coming in such a way that I am just as sure that it comes from my spirit friends as I am that I can see the daily rising and setting of the sun. I have no doubt that many others have had a similar experience.

Spiritualism has no miracles to offer. All of its manifestations are in harmony with natural law, certain causes producing certain effects. The knowledge that comes through these effects simply enlarges our range of vision. Throughout the universe the most powerful forces are invisible forces. The most advanced scientists admit this fact. Spiritualists simply carry this thought a little farther when they claim that there are mental or spiritual forces. Viewing the matter in this light, why should not Spiritualism be called a scientific religion—a religion founded not on theory or belief but on fact? Of course no finite mind has yet discovered all of the laws that govern these forces and probably never will, but enough has already been demonstrated to establish certain facts. As to what the terms religion or Spiritualism really mean, there will be a great variety of opinion, no two persons having precisely the same conception of it. Each one forms his own estimate, and what that conclusion will be will depend upon environment, education, character and the great variety of causes that tend to make each one of us a distinct individuality. Each one has to study the subject for himself and formulate his own creed if he wants one. Even among Baptists or Methodists who have a special creed, I have no idea that any two of them hold precisely the same views.

I think that Spiritualists are all agreed as to a few leading points. All believe in a future existence, in the possibility of communion with our spirit friends and that our condition after we leave the physical form will depend entirely upon what we have learned and experience in our earthly pilgrimage. As to what is the best way to attain happiness here and in spirit life, there is the greatest variety of opinion. Some will say that evolution being a law of nature we are all certain to progress no matter what we do. Others claim that we need the experience of every phase of life else we cannot progress. Belief will always depend upon the moral and intellectual unfoldment of the individual.

During the civil war a colored Baptist preacher was my servant at Vicksburg, and after the siege and surrender I resigned and took him home with me to Iowa. Trusting too much to his honesty, I allowed him to cheat me out of about thirty-five dollars, which he acknowledged that he had done. I asked him how he expected to get to heaven if he lied and cheated that way. His reply was. "Massa Captain, what is the use of Jesus Christ dying for sinners if a man can't lie and cheat some? If we never committed any sin we would go to heaven without Jesus. He made it so that we can commit sin and still get to heaven." Too much of the religion of the world has been of that kind and I fear that some of the believers in spiritual manifestations do not have a much better religion.

What can we expect from ignorant and selfish people who have only been kept in restraint by fear, when they give up their belief in hell and the devil? I wish all such could be induced to read "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." True Spiritualism when properly understood, teaches the highest altruism, but all are not capable of so understanding it. Notwithstanding this condition of things which we are obliged to put up with, I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion the great majority of Spiritualists who take an active interest in Spiritualism, in meetings, camps and societies, are engaged in advocating the most elevated, altruistic religion that has ever been presented to the world, a religion that is fast disintegrating the creeds and errors of all orthodox religions, and laying the foundation of the coming religion which will be in harmony with natural law and therefore a truly scientific religion.

SPIRITUALISM

A Religion for the Redemption of Humanity.

Instead of making Spiritualism a religious movement, many of our Spiritualists are discussing "if" they can make it so.

They are very much "worried about it." Our whole movement before the world and for the people, is incessantly torn to pieces by the internal dissensions in our ranks. These disruptionists are strongly incensed by the old definition of religion—"To bind anew," or "To bind." They are afraid of being bound—especially to pay something in money to support the cause. The fear of expending dollars and cents will prevent the selfish from engaging in any humanitarian projects. These lovers of "spirit help" are not willing to render any human help. They consult spirits to get pointers on the markets, races, business and domestic affairs; and these have cost them several dollars and they have called it investigating Spiritualism—hence others should expend their good money if they want to realize spirit dividends and insure material increase. The woods are full of this kind of Spiritualists, and they with one voice say: "Spiritualism is not a religion."

But they who have derived comfort in sorrow, sweet communion with loved ones gone before to the soul-land, and sat at the feet of spirit teachers, with one accord tell of its sanctity and its helpfulness intellectually, morally and spiritually and say, "Yes, it is a religion."

These have enlarged the word "religion" to mean: "The practice of moral duties; Godliness or piety in practice. Any system of faith and worship; Belief (or knowledge) of a superior power or powers governing the world." These as enumerated by Webster—to which we add "Proofs of spirit life and communion; knowledge of moral law; proofs of physical acts upon the spirit body we are evolving; moral culture; intellectual culture appertaining to spiritual law; purity; piety; the search for and worship of truth."

Progress in human life enlarges the sphere and creates new definitions of words. Why cannot we do that for the word "religion?" Must we let the past deficiencies control the present? Because priests and theologians have aborted religion to worship of a personal God and to the bondage of creeds, must we give up all moral force and spiritual culture that Spiritualism can evolve?

Because we receive spirit phenomena, must we say it is only a fact and of no value except as a demonstration?

Facts in nature are of no avail to discover unless humanity can utilize them for some practical purposes. To stand and look at a demonstration of natural law may be awe-inspiring and will attract a crowd—but the sensible scientist will make some use of it for human good.

Do they use the telephone or wire to only explain how a message is transmitted? In your circular letter you say they do, Mr. Editor. You know that the scientists have utilized the telephone and the wire for practical and incessant message-bearing, and the spiritual scientist will do the same for spirit modes of transmission. Thus falls your proposed utilization of the "spirit communion as a scientific fact, and nothing else." You might as well say, Let us have nothing else of everything, as to say it of this one thing.

Utilization is the demand nature makes of mankind—hence we propose to utilize spirit communion to the needs of human minds and immortal souls. To do that, the true sphere of religion must be entered and Spiritualism be made to conserve its ethical and practical purposes. Suppose there are such spirits as Guiteau, Booth, and Czolgosz communicating. Does it prove no others can? Does it not prove that all others can?

Now, if you hold to low forms of spirit manifestation, and relegate the same "exclusively to the domain of science," you will likely hold communion with only crude spirits. That is what your "only for science" does! You are sensuous and crude and hence no great progress is made beyond the discovery of a fact. That is the entire domain of science. The utilization of the fact belongs to the artisan, the philosopher and they who seek for comfort, happiness and usefulness, and may be enlarged to the needs of life continuous after death in the soul habitat, because such life is a direct continuance of the one we lead here and the needs are inseparably interblended.

Thus the sphere of religion is environed by the needs of the soul. As spirit communion and Spiritualism conserves the soul-needs, they unfold the true religion—for the latter is related to our soul-life rather than to only the temporary and changing earth-life.

Into this utility of Spiritualism we must enlarge our organized cause, or perish amidst the cold and unsatisfying shoals of a material coast where the breakers wildly dash and moan, telling us only of a force that we cannot overcome and which must ever stand as a menace. But around the madness of physical crudity concentrated into a maelstrom, we sail into peaceful harbors and find fertile shores for spiritual culture and the utilization of the higher good.

Shall Spiritualism be engulfed in the maelstrom of scientific facts breaking upon the shoals of intellect's boundless domain? or shall it reach the harbors where spiritual development is possible and mental, moral and spiritual life be the outcome of scientific and philosophic application?

What is Spiritual-ism?

The word "spiritual," is defined by Webster as meaning, "Consisting of spirit; not material; incorporeal; not gross; refined from external things; not sensual; not lay or temporal; relating to sacred things; ecclesiastical. Pertaining to spirit or to the affections; pure; holy.

"Pertaining to divine things.

"A spiritual and refined religion."

If the ism of Spiritualism relates to all these, then it is a religion. If not so, then it is not rightly named.

All religions are spiritual. How can Spiritualism fail to be a religion?

As a scientist you can be a spiritual scientist—but you are something more when you become a Spiritual-ist.

What means the suffix "ism" we attach to the word "Spiritual?" Webster says it is "A suffix implying doctrine, theory, principle, system, or practice of; abstract idea of that signified by the word to which it is subjoined."

Take the word "spiritual" and the suffix "ism" and apply the meanings thereof, and what have we? The doctrine, theory, principle, system and practice of spiritual life based upon all that is consisting of spirit that is refined from external things, not sensual, gross, nor temporal—relating to sacred things, and is connected with all that is ecclesiastical.

The last and supreme application to all that is ecclesiastical, means that it is "pertaining or relating to the church." Hence we can have the church of Spiritualism and not be simply a sectarian church—but the true ecclesia.

If you do not want to go with the Spiritualists into this organized body (ecclesia) then set up for yourselves as Spirit-ists. It is high time for a division and separation. I sincerely advocate this separation of the devotees only of "the spirit" from they who also seek for and are devoted to "the spiritual."

Let us no longer be handicapped by the Spirit-ists who seek not for the spiritual—but as Spiritual-ists go forward to the redemption of humanity from gross sensuality and selfishness into the pure sanctity of a spiritual life. Let us be humanitarians!

The God-idea need not disturb us. We can worship God as spirit and in spirit, and not as an ecclesia may have dictated or shall dictate. We can enlarge the religion of Spiritualism from the worship of a personal God into the concept of and devotion to godliness immanent in all personality. To the development of godliness or goodness—to the evolvement of human attributes, physical, mental, moral and spiritual our Spiritualism can be utilized.

Will we do it? Or, shall we embrace a fact and worship it for self in this life and thus stagnate upon physical planes with no concept of high, broad, pure, true and useful principles and forces of life that will enlarge all humanity into a divine consanguinity?

What you need to solve now, is, Can we make Spiritualism useful? If you try to do that, you will need not quarrel about whether it is a philosophy, a science or a religion. You will discover it is all these—and as the latter, is the best ever developed for human good, and as the former is predicated upon demonstrable facts that will ever be provable and will ever lead to the true, beautiful and good.

GEORGE W. KATES.

NOT EITHER.

A Moral Philosophy of Mankind.

Should Spiritualism take a place among the prevailing religions of the world, or a place on a scientific basis, among the sciences of to-day? Not either.

Various kinds of savage, bloodthirsty, barbarous, and inhuman religions, from the earliest period of time that we have any knowledge of, down to the present day, have always existed among the nations of the earth, and each religion has had its due share of followers. Thousands upon thousands of innocent victims have been slain, put to death to appease the malicious votaries and fanatical followers, to uphold and perpetuate the claims of religion.

Thousands upon thousands of dollars have been spent upon individuals, to educate them to proclaim and spread abroad the knowledge of these religions to mankind. Millions upon millions of money have been used to prepare suitable churches and edifices, wherein to proclaim a knowledge of these various religions throughout the nations of the globe. And all these religions are based upon some high, overruling, and superior intelligences, whose claims are—Worship thou Me!

To class Spiritualism with such damnable debasing, would be a travesty and an abomination on its fair name.

Spiritualism, from a sacrificial standpoint of worship of a personal God, or the death and resurrection of a human being to reclaim the soul from inherited sin, is not a religion, in any sense of the word.

Spiritualism is not based on the shedding of blood, or the death and resurrection of any one, and is not classed as a religion by the more intelligent thinker; it is only those that have escaped from the octopus folds of old orthodoxy and have not as yet entirely outgrown and cast off their old and bloody garments, but still cling to the name—Religion and Church with a tenacious veneration that should be cast aside for the more worthy use and expansion of a better judgment. Spiritualists are not all blind idolaters, blind leaders of the blind, by no means; they bow at no imperialism, they worship at the shrine of no imaginary God to absolve them from sins committed while on the earth, they are beholden to the death and resurrection of no one, to insure eternal life. Their theory is justice to themselves, and humanitarian justice to their fellow man.

They are independent thinkers, follow in the wake of no arbitration, draw their own conclusions, and weigh all theories with a critic's eye.

Neither is Spiritualism a science. Scientific pursuits are the result of acquired knowledge, and ideals entirely in experimental investigation of and unveiling the hidden forces and unknown quantities of Nature, that are facts that the people are ignorant of, yet existing in the material forces of Nature, and presenting their inherent value to the world for its benefit. If we should talk about discovering the scientific qualities of the soul, or the scientific properties of the mind, or the scientific intricacy of thought, the world would laugh at our credulity, and rightly so would be the verdict against the claim that Spiritualism, or the life principle in nature is a science.

There is no such a quantity in a human being as a natural religion, or natural science. All religions, and all acquirements of the human mind are purely mechanical. The child which is a blank at birth, is mechanically taught either objectively or theoretically, in all its associations from its youth to a full development.

Spiritualism is a moral philosophy of mankind, in explanation of the existence of man, delineating his origin, present and future destiny. In order to philosophise understandingly we must necessarily seek the origin of Spiritualism, which is spirit from whence it is a deduction, and to philosophise on Spirit, we must seek its origin, which is an impossibility, as it always existed from time immemorial, does exist, and always will exist.

Thus Spiritualism is a philosophy of Nature, or to be more explicit, is more of a naturalism than any other name that can be presented. The phenomena of spirit return is as ancient as we have any record of time, but was always recognized by some other name, as witchcraft, familiar spirits, possessed of devils, etc.

Spiritualism is outside and beyond all religions or sciences, or amalgamations of to-day. It stands boldly out, independently and alone, and needs no classification with any theory to bolster up its claims, or to prop up its position. All it asks of the world is investigation of its principles. C. P. MITCHELL.

SPIRITUALISM.

Is It Science, or Religion, Which?

If Spiritualism means anything that is worth contending for and instructing the people in, it means knowledge—knowledge of human life as met with in and out of the body. The study and acquirement of those natural laws by which we as spiritual beings, may reach our greatest unfoldment in this earthly existence and the better prepare us for the existence which is to follow.

Stormonth, the best lexicographer of recent years, defines religion as "That obligation or sense of duty which rests on the minds of men, arising from the felt relation in which they stand to an almighty power; belief in God, with a sincere desire to do His will; godliness; any system of faith and worship; religious rites."

By a careful examination of this definition it will be plain to all that religion pertains exclusively to some being (imaginary or otherwise) called God, and man's duties and relations to Him.

To my mind whatever supreme power exists in the limitless expanse of space it operates by fixed and unalterable laws—that through the operation of these laws our solar system and finally man have been brought into existence as personalities. That their essences, principles, sublimated substances and grosser parts, have eternally existed and will eternally exist.

That man's greatest and most important aim should be to so shape, control, and conduct his personality as to achieve the most and enjoy the greatest privileges and happiness possible to that personality.

Spiritualism has demonstrated the fact that some of the human race, at least, have a conscious existence after the incident of death. How long that personality may exist, whether forever or a limited time, it is quite useless to speculate upon.

Even if our personal conscious existence ended with death, it would still be incumbent on us to use that existence to the best advantage; for if a lengthened existence be very valuable, a shorter existence would only be of less value to us; and what is best for one is best for all.

He who believes that he may disregard and trample upon the rights of others with resulting benefit to himself has studied the finer forces and laws of his being in vain.

The grand principles of justice and the law of compensation are as universal in their operations, as absolute and inexorable, as space and time.

There are no infinite forces or existences that could desire our praise or worship, or that could answer our prayers except through the operation of law—unchangeable law. And when our prayers and desires are in conformity with Nature's laws they are certain to be answered, no matter to whom they are addressed. So that the savage or heathen who prays to his Joss, or image of stone, wood, or earthenware, has the same chance for favorable answer as he who addresses Jove, God or Jehovah.

Herman Wettstein says in his article in No. 635 of The Progressive Thinker: "It is through this unwarranted exaltation of the mind in Nature that many of the world's greatest thinkers and scientists have rejected the hypothesis of such intelligence (God) in toto."

If the Infinite Intelligence believed in by our N. S. A. is that order of inherent ideal-form intelligence that exists in the protoplasmic or elementary life substance that pervades all space I would find no fault with the proposition as stated in their Declaration of Principles.

But my understanding of the meaning of that declaration has been, and is still, that the intelligence named means a supervising intelligence of all Cosmos who would be capable of hearing and answering prayer; directing how and when solar systems should be organized and designing their uses and destinies.

That the life elementaries that occupy space have inhering in them form-ideals is a fact too patent to an ordinary observer to be contradicted.

But that there is an intelligence that has ordained and established the laws of nature and who designs and forms universes and solar systems, and men, animals and vegetables, I deny. On the contrary I affirm that the laws that govern matter, spirit, and the elementary life principles and substances inhere within such substances and are coeval and coefficient with them.

One reason that to my mind is conclusive on this hypothesis is this: If the laws of nature have been ordained and established by some supreme power then there must have existed a time when they did not exist; and if this same power or being has created and organized the material worlds and systems of worlds that abound in space, then there must have existed a time when all there was in space was the supreme power, or God. And the time of his duration before such laws were ordained and worlds created was a limitless eternity, which is an absurd proposition on its statement.

Rest assured, dear reader, that there has been no creation—no calling into existence that which was not. All that exists to-day has ever existed and ever will; including nature's laws, elementaries, forces, principles, spirit, life, soul, matter, and substance of whatever name or nature, attributes and characteristics.

The natural laws governing the universe of spirit, life and soul are as inherent and absolute in those substances as are the laws governing the grosser forms of matter.

In nature there is neither creation nor annihilation, but one continuous round of change of form and phenomena. Most certainly is this the case in the material world to the utmost extent that our senses may reach; so that we may reasonably conclude that a like law of change is going on continually in every department of nature in the realm of the forces and in the domains of spirit and life.

Nature not only abhors vacuums, but it abhors stability; and so far as our observation, experience and reason instruct and inform us, it ever moves forward in cycles of greater or less duration.

Man's greatest mistake has been in believing that outside of and over and above nature there was some being that had created nature and who governed and controlled it agreeably to his desire. This is the real God idea. An idea as false as the idea that the earth was flat—both having their origin in the infancy of man, one from appearance, the other from fear.

To correct this idea is worthy the ambition and energy of any one; as it necessarily makes of that being a monster and has brought into this world more pain and suffering than all other false ideas combined.

If these propositions are true, which I firmly believe and which all nature seems to corroborate, then I think I should be made an honorary member of the Godless and Devilless Club, and I hereby promise to do all I can to advance its most holy undertakings.

I am aware that man has had the god idea instilled into the every fiber of his being for generations upon generations, century after century, until it has become hereditary and very difficult to correct. It will require centuries for its elimination, even as the idea of the flatness of the earth required centuries to combat and overcome. I have heard people affirm that they did not believe that the earth was round and assign weak and fallacious reasons for such belief, etc.

Without a creating and supervising God, man could have no religion, i. e., in the general acceptation and meaning of the word religion.?

A religion without a God to worship and to pray to, and ask favors of would be like the play of Hamlet with the Dane left out, and would resolve itself into pure science, which is the knowledge of facts and laws in any department of mind or matter, digested and arranged into a system; profound and complete knowledge.

What more is Spiritualism than this? Why go further with our affirmations than we know? Why step outside of the domain of knowledge and established truth into the uncertain realms of faith and speculation?

Not that I would curtail reason and speculation; on the contrary I would stimulate and encourage them, for through their exercise the mind acquires strength to grasp and comprehend truth.

Spiritualism to me is the careful study, knowledge and practice of the laws that make for righteousness, that govern the personalized existence of our life forces—our real selves—so that we may avoid that which is harmful and cleave to that which is beneficial; thereby unfolding and evolving us to our highest and most perfect spiritual estate. B. F. SLITER.

QUESTION OF VIEW-POINT.

Spiritualism a Science, a Philosophy and a Religion.

Responding to your important question, whether Spiritualism should be regarded solely as a science or a religion, I have to say that to me Spiritualism is too all-embracing, is too comprehensive to be distinctively regarded simply as one or the other—"that and nothing more."

By way of classification, let me premise that a certain percentage of Spiritualists, say one-third, are probably of the materialistic class, some of whom are of the ultra type. It is also true that those who would restrict it to a science are among the most able and strenuous Spiritualists known to the ranks. It is, however, largely a question of view-point. But a larger percentage, it is thought, are more inclined to be religious in their views. They are as they are. Neither blame nor praise attaches to either. Phrenologically speaking, the latter class are characterized by a larger degree of the aspirational element; hope is strong; devotion is active; veneration is marked; spirituality grows more and more a desirable quality—in brief, the feeling of worship is very natural and pronounced, and seeks expression. Being "spiritually minded" is something else and something more than being possessed of a knowledge of certain classified facts—the definition of science.

Science relates itself to, and marks the progress of the world in and apart from matters other than spiritual.

"Religion relates itself to emotion, to feeling—"thought in its last analysis is feeling"—relates itself to faith, love, imagination."

Science, popularly apprehended, confines itself to a single realm—the physical. Religion has to do with the physical and the spiritual. By way of contrast, one is of the earth earthy; the other of earth and heaven, heavenly, at least in its logical aspirations.

Science deals specifically with phenomena, the nature and forces of matter.

Religion is the conscious relation between man and a higher power outside of himself, an omnipresent principle of Nature and of human nature. Science is the exponent of materialism. Religion is an expression of Spiritualism. Science may be termed objective; religion subjective. Science finds its place with outward nature; religion has its home with inward nature. Religion is not arrayed against science—it supplements it.

Spiritualism is, first of all, a fact. By the aggregation and classification of its facts a science is established, the same as with every other science. A knowledge of its phenomena and the laws governing their operation, constitute its philosophy. The application of its doctrines to their legitimate objects, the relation of its teachings to the necessary ends of human reason and wisdom, form its religion.

The religion of Spiritualism grows out of proven facts, having a consistent and logical outcome. It neither damns for doubt nor saves for belief.

Does not the demonstration of a continued, conscious existence after so-called death upon which immortality is predicated—ally itself fundamentally with what is known as religion? Is not the positive knowledge of a mother's love, for instance, with all that that implies in its correlation, after physical separation has taken place, something more than a mere segment of cold science? Material science does not cognize moral principle, analyze consciousness or explain intuition. What does science know of the soul but to deny its existence?

O. B. Frothingham justly observes that "Religion is something more than dry knowledge; it is philosophy and science infused with feeling."

If the teachings and truths taught by and embraced in the logical doctrines of Spiritualism, do not constitute what is comprehended by the term religion, what does constitute religion? Spiritualism is not only a science and a philosophy, but its religion rests upon demonstrated facts scientifically verified. It is thus what may properly be called a natural religion. No other can answer the demands of the soul nature by which spiritual growth is attained.

Religion teaches that man is a soul and has a body. Science declares that he has a body and has no soul.

If Spiritualism has to do with soul or the spiritual nature of man; if it comes to comfort the mourner, to bind up the broken-hearted, to strengthen the weak, to liberate the mentally enslaved, or to spiritualize individual lives—then is it to be regarded as a religion.

So, whether Spiritualism shall administer solely to the physical side of life, or to the spiritual, I answer, both!—holding that Spiritualism is equally to be regarded as a science, a philosophy, and a religion,—corresponding to the practical, the ethical, and the spiritual departments of man's nature.

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Spiritualism the Science of Spirit.

To the Editor:—By request, I will offer a few thoughts on "An Important Question." "Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world?"

Modern Spiritualism in its purpose and relation to mankind does not belong to—is not a member of the family of "The Ten Great Religions" of the world.

She is an "alien from the commonwealth of" ritualistic observances "and a stranger from" the priestly "covenants, having no hope" in the gods of antiquity, nor the vicarious atonements of the many "crucified Saviors."

She repudiates all infallible books—all angry gods, and rapacious devils. She owes allegiance to neither kings, potentates nor popes.

She drinks of the waters of truth, from even the chalice of Jewish, Gentile, or Christian literature. She is clad in the pure raiment of intellectual and spiritual light. Her shining feet are "beautiful on the mountains" of consecrated error.

Her scepter of love and equity is extended in clemency and wisdom toward all the sons and daughters of mankind. The earth plane is her present field of incessant labor, with many grievous hindrances which greatly retard her onward movements. The spirit realm is her future home, where the nations of earth will meet on the plane of equity in the schools of eternal progress.

Upon the unyielding rock of demonstrated facts she stands self-poised, calm, but defiant against all the hosts of ignorance, bigotry, and consecrated superstition.

She ignores all distinction among mankind except the qualities of the immortal soul which have been refined and developed in the light of her glowing fact.

As "without * * beginning of days, or end of life," she wields her scepter of wisdom, love and truth, over the destinies of mankind.

"Should Spiritualism take her place among the great religions of the world?"

Should the venerable Sage be domiciled with the undeveloped and credulous rustic?

Should the dove consort with the vulture?

Should the intelligent freeman return to the pains and burdens of serfdom?

Should individuals of mature mentality, to fill their mission as immortal men and women, take their places amid the pastimes and fables of childhood?

Modern Spiritualism has no place, as a system of religion, or as a science among the "Great Religions" of the world.

Her demonstrated facts destroy the very basis of all creeds. Her freedom in progressive thought overleaps all the sacred boundaries of "the great religions of the world."

There is no system of religion, ancient or modern, whose intellectual and spiritual domain is sufficiently broad to receive the shining retinue of living facts which attend the onward march of this peerless queen of progress and thought.

Her firm hand is now upon the unbarred open door of life eternal. Her voice, clear as the note of a silver trumpet, has declared the scientific fact, "There is no death." Her spiritual genius has forever bridged the yawning gulf between the mortal and the immortal planes.

Modern Spiritualism in her native excellence can never rank with the "great religions."

Because, Modern Spiritualism is a Fact. A fact as indestructible as the center of the solar system, whose genial rays, it is true, are often obscured by dense vapor. So in like manner is the light of true Spiritualism obscured by vapor emanating from the lips of egotism and ignorance—"zeal without knowledge."

"The ten great religions" are based upon Faith. That faith centers in "conjecture." That in turn has its origin in the mental domain of ancient prophets, priests and sages.

Modern Spiritualism is the peerless daughter of "Mother Nature and Father Spirit." She is herself a fact of perfect proportions—because she is the legitimate offspring of the two greatest facts—Nature and Spirit.

But like many other good things, she was not properly named when she appeared among mankind in March, 1848.

Modern Science of Spirit, or Modern Spiritual Science—would have been more appropriate than Modern Spiritualism.

"Science" is not a term that the ordinary mind should fear—as though it was intended for the classic only. "Science" is simply "knowledge, grounded on demonstration, and self-evident principles * * knowledge systematically and properly arranged."

Is not spirit return and the continuity of life "grounded on demonstration?"

Has it not as a fundamental principle been submitted to the severest tests in the crucible of modern science?

Not sought for by faith in the "findings" of councils, or in the "conjectures" of sacred synods, but the keen eyes of modern science have sought for "spirit return," and found the Fact.

Has not the "knowledge" of spirit intercourse, in the varied mental phenomena been "systematically arranged?" and placed before the reading world through the media of standard Spiritual literature?

Hence, Modern Spiritualism is a "Science." It is not a "Religion." It is the "science" of spirit, and spiritual phenomena both physical and mental.

The Scientist is ever on the alert with some newly imported "cult"—Oriental preferred—or some popular "fad" from the "home market"—that will give him or her a place on the public rostrum as exponents of "Higher Spiritualism."

They delight to ramble in the flowery fields of "correspondencies." They press into service the Old and the New Testaments, as a kind of sacred chart, or indefinite outline of acknowledged authority—to explain(?) the "science" of spiritual phenomena.

Those ancient records belong to the youngest member in the family of the "Ten Great Religions," and when used as "credentials" by the expounders of "fads" and "cults," they create an atmosphere of equal density with that of ecclesiasticism, whose emissaries go forth in "clerical" garb, bearing sacred titles, which are regarded by the multitude as "canonical" trade-marks.

"Whether the phenomena * * should be assigned a place in the domain of science, by the side of the achievements of Edison, Tesla and others, is a question of deep and significant import. If the "science" of spirit is a fact, and that fact known and can be demonstrated, then mankind has a science as much superior to physical science as spirit is superior to matter.

Is not spirit the primary cause of all effects? If not, why not?

Whether the effect be the moving of a ponderous train or the instinctive impulse that sends the birds homeward to the South, at the approach of winter. Spirit is omnipotent. Edison and Tesla, with a host of others, are but finely adjusted instruments. The thought centers of these two great mentalities are the ceaseless looms, whose flying shuttles of inventive genius have woven a marvelous web of mechanical wonders, the intricate pattern and design of which has been reflected from excarnate minds in the realm of spirit. O. F. COLE.

Dowagiac, Mich.

SPIRITUALISM:

Should It Affiliate with Religion or Science?

Why Spiritualism should be placed in the category of religions, is puzzling to the person whose views in life are regulated by reason and not by emotion. There is no religion under the sun that is not based upon a creed which begins "I believe"; while Spiritualism goes beyond that and says, "I know." All religions are systems of faith, pure and simple, and have no connections with facts in any way, shape or manner.

There is no positive force in any religion known to mortal man, for every one of them stops short with the assertion of belief in things and conditions that transcend the physical senses.

No devotee of any religion claims positive knowledge in the realm of his asserted spiritual facts, and evidence is never presented to uphold and establish his creed and dogmas. The joys of heaven and the salvation that religion offers to mankind, rest on belief. You accept the claims of religion through belief, and by that belief your salvation is attained, and in no other manner. Knowledge is never asked or expected in any religious claim, for religion deals with the unknown and the invisible.

The foundation on which religion builds its creeds and dogmas, is God and a future existence; but what does it know of either? Absolutely nothing. What value then has its doctrines and its affirmations? None at all; for anything to have value or importance to the human mind, must rest on demonstrated facts. You can tie to nothing else with safety, benefit or confidence, for an unrestricted imagination is the poorest guide that ever led a human being into the realms of possibility or probability.

As religion has no facts that touch or sustain the idea of a future life, we see at once the great difference between religion and Spiritualism. Phenomena are the basis of Spiritualism and upon it are built all the claims put forth in that name. There is no unsupported faith in Spiritualism; for phenomena precede every assertion it presents to the inquiring mind. There is always a fact on which to build its doctrine of a continued existence, and these facts are what lead to a rational and well-founded belief that consciousness extends beyond the grave. Whether these facts are absolute proof or not, does not require discussion at this time, for the only object in referring to them, is to show that Spiritualism has something tangible to build on, while religion has not.

Emotion and phenomena are the two words that justly define the status of religion and Spiritualism, and such being the case they can no more be placed in the same category than science and religion. While Spiritualism has a single fact to rest on, you cannot make a religion of it, no matter how badly some wish to connect it with that name. Spiritualism is in a separate and distinct class by itself, and the work which devolves upon it is to prove man's immortality by phenomena, and not to cherish that belief through faith, as does religion. Ask the Christian what evidence he has of an immortal soul, and he will tell you none not found in the New Testament. But the New Testament is not a living, present fact, such as Spiritualism deals with; it is a collection of writings that are not worth the paper needed to give them expression; for their truth or falsity has no means of verification. Unsupported statements made in writing are just as worthless as those made by the tongue; and yet that species of religion which here flourishes, has no other basis.

If Spiritualism can furnish through phenomena, absolute proof that death does not destroy human consciousness, it must take its place in the category of science and remain there. There is nothing sacred about natural facts and realities, and as God and religion have a monopoly on that word, it is a misnomer when applied to Spiritualism. To call it a sacred religion is to misuse the name and convey a wrong idea. No one has ever claimed that science—"a knowledge of facts and forces"—was sacred, and if Spiritualism can convince the world—which it has not yet done—that its claims which rest on undisputed phenomena are really true, it must be recognized as a branch of science and nothing more.

Spiritualism professes no knowledge of God and finds it impossible to obtain any, so it would make a mighty poor religion when all that we ever knew or heard of had God for their starting point.

No God, no religion, is the plain statement of a universal fact, and as Spiritualism has none, every rational man with proper regard for the dictionary and its decisions, must admit the absurdity of calling Spiritualism a religion. The world has had a surfeit of religions and the human race has been kept too long in bondage by them. We want no more, and we want to get rid of those systems we now have as soon as possible; so instead of trying to make Spiritualism a nondescript species to keep alive the religious sentiment, its advocates and defenders would much better work to establish its scientific basis beyond all cavil, doubt and denial; for scientific facts are what the world wants, among thinking people at least, and if Spiritualism can give them in sufficient quantity to carry general conviction throughout the world, it will be doing an important work and one that will so monopolize the time of its disseminators, that they will have no leisure to devote to religious nonsense. If there is any proof of another life, which so many of us now doubt, let Spiritualism unite with science in revealing it, and keep as far as possible from God and the religious idea.

SPIRITUALISM.

A Great Scientific Religious Philosophy.

Spiritualism derives no powers from without nature's domain, nor is it proved, or even rational, in my opinion, to suppose that aught else does. It acknowledges no supernaturalism.

Spirits are entities, not nothings—somebodies, not nobodies. The spirit world is a reality, and somewhere; not an imaginary realm, and so nowhere. It is a material, tangible world, with real objects and actual living beings, and, though invisible to us, yet impinges upon this world. In fact we are spirits now, actuating our physical bodies, as much as we ever will be, when expressing ourselves through spiritual bodies; and those gone hence are no more spirits, nor less such, although their vehicles of expression may not be visible to us in the mortal. An invisible world of such spirits obtaining, natural laws must control that world as well as this. In that world, probably no more than here, certainly no less, is there reason to believe, that there is a departure from those rules of life and action, which outwork the greatest good in the fitness and adaptation of things to each other, of objects to desire, of instruments to capacity and of ends to means; and that, too, as refers to those of the invisible world to their special and immediate environment, or to their associations, dealings and manifestations with us in mundane life.

The world talks glibly of natural laws and their action in the universe, so far as matter and life can be by it tested, and a Drummond, and thinkers akin, teach learnedly of natural (physical?) law in the invisible spirit world, and a large number of intelligent people, with much experience, and the results of a thorough research, as reliable evidence now call attention to the demonstrated fact of spiritual laws (no less natural) in manifestation in physical (and possibly no less spiritual) life. These are the generally accepted conclusions from the study of occult, psychical, psychological and spiritistical facts and appearances.

The phenomena of Spiritualism are all the product of the harmonious action of natural laws. It is the object of the labors of intelligent Spiritualists to ascertain the operations of these very laws. They hold that what we see, even in the seance-room, are but the results of elemental and lawful action, yet, with their experiences, experiments and close observation they have decided that excarnate spirits, while they are, like ourselves, governed by law, they also can and do, like ourselves again, take advantage of certain laws and playing forces, and intelligently, or otherwise, apply or direct them to certain results and purposes.

Spiritualism is, therefore, a science, and so, eventually, it will establish itself. Spiritualists are, at best, yet simply philosophers—positive philosophers, though in the broadest sense, believing because only content to accept the evidence of their senses, preferring fact to faith, choosing reason to guide and never countenancing superstition. In fact, in my estimation, Spiritualism is fast establishing itself already as such a great experimental science, and I can but think that before this twentieth century shall end, it will be so acknowledged by unbiased professors and students of nature and law in all departments, and of all schools, and it will be admitted to the place toward which it tends, and where it belongs, in the great domain of sciences.

I cannot look upon Spiritualism, per se, as a religion. It seems to me that a misapprehension of Spiritualism's true character and object obtains with those Spiritualists who deem it so essential to preserve unity of belief on numerous moral and theological questions, in order to secure concert of action, general consideration and consequent popular success, in the dissemination of the one distinctive, cardinal basic proposition, viz., that departed spirits manifest and communicate.

It is by some deemed politic, that if we would gain general audience and lenience, attention and popularity in the presentation of mediumship and the consideration of Spiritualism, we should offer to the world, as a body politic of believers, a front of agreement as Spiritualists on our views of God, Christ, prayer, reform, morals, religion, etc., even to using such specious and covert language in formulation as will least antagonize those of other views, especially the evangelical Christians. I do not believe in such a course, and could not countenance it even though it were possible. We are "many men of many minds" on questions aside from our one distinctive demonstrated proposition, thus precluding the possibility. But, if uniformity of opinions obtained relative to these points, still I would question the advisability of such action. Spiritualists, as such, per se, cannot be harmoniously affiliated, nor work agreeably together, united on aught of a specific creedal nature, except on the bare fact of spirit return and manifestation.

While I do not consider Spiritualism, in and of itself, a religion, yet on it may rest, and I believe will be founded, eventually, what might best be known, possibly, as a grand, Scientific, Religious Philosophy. At any rate, it is as a series of startling phenomena, a matter of wonderful fact, a natural revelation, that Spiritualism, at first, and mostly, appeals to mankind. It knows no Catholic, no Protestant, no Independent—it is mindful of no bible, creed, or sect—in fact, it regards not, necessarily, moral codes, written laws, or prevailing opinions, but irrespective of names, books, parchments, beliefs or behavior, it says, "Here I am. Search me and know me!" It appeals to humanity—to men and women, particularly to those of fair-mindedness and intelligence, whether in the church or out, whether estimated high or low, and whether religiously inclined or worldly-minded. And this appeal is made through spirit interference, intercourse, manifestation and communication.

When human kind heed the appeal, become acquainted with the phenomena and learn the truth established thereby, they are Spiritualists, to use the word which was so carelessly applied in years agone, and now so long and commonly used as to be a fixture. In reality, though, the word is a misnomer. It were better Spiritists. By using the words Spiritualist and Spiritualism, we carried to the world the idea of a spiritual and holy personage and a pure and divine revelation, and sanctioned the world-accepted belief that we laid claim to a new religion, and that we were religionists. Our science and philosophy have been thus mercilessly and unwittingly criticised as a religion, and we Spiritualists have naturally been censured severely, and unnecessarily, as religionists. As soon, and as well, denounce geology, physiology and psychology as religions; and decry the geologist, the physiologist and psychologist as a religionist. Their revelations and discoveries were scientific, and established sciences were resultant, while they were students and scholars. Their beliefs, spiritual or infidel, their creeds, liberal or narrow, and their morals, good or bad, never brought criticism and censure on them as professors or followers of their respective sciences; nor were their sciences and philosophies brought into reproach and ill-repute as religions. So might it have been, possibly, with us and our natural revelation, had we represented ourselves simply as students in a great discovery, and characterized ourselves and our science by distinctively secular and scientific names. At any rate the great majority of the styled Spiritualists in the land are far from being religionists, even in the broadest and best sense, let alone the standing they have evangelically considered, and Spiritualism to them is little more than a demonstration in evidence of spirit intercommunion, with somewhat of a more or less vague sort of philosophy.

I write of the "rank and file" as I find them in my travels. I would not disparage or write slightingly of the large body of devoted investigators, intelligent acceptants, scholarly teachers and earnest advocates. True, men and women of thought convinced by the phenomena, naturally reason and deduce knowledge therefrom, and reinterpret history in the light of the revelations, and through convincing mediumship allow themselves to be taught by the spirits so far as matters may be comprehensible, at least. Then the science of Spiritualism unfolds naturally a great and interesting philosophy.

Thus elevating the individual by ennobling the thoughts, quickening the nature by its direct influence, and giving strength to assert and maintain true manhood and womanhood, Spiritualism comes to be felt as a great reformatory movement, and is seen readily to be a practical power for good. And so, in this sense, through its ultimate unfolding, many are brought out into the practice of a great religion. Religion not in the single sense of certain obligations one owes to God, as religion is generally considered to be, but that, and additionally and more particularly, in the sense of an acknowledgment of universal brotherhood and a consequent dutiful relation toward our fellow-men.

But this religion, while naturally led up to through spirit teaching and development, is not patent to Spiritualism—is not distinctively its teaching alone—but belongs to the great religion, Humanitarianism, and is patent to the conscience, and is alike taught by all schools of ethical science. The individual who recognizes the laws of human brotherhood, which link them to every other man, and who fulfills the obligations thereto attracted, is a religious man, whether an orthodox or a heterodox, whether a church man or a man of the world, whether a Spiritualist or a Materialist. But this religion, be it repeated in emphasis, is not distinctively inherent in, and is in no way patent to Spiritualism, hence is not THE RELIGION OF, nor is its name SYNONYMOUS WITH SPIRITUALISM.

Spiritualism is penetrative and permeating, and despite our fastidious tastes as to how it ought to have come, where it ought to have come and gone, what it ought to have done and how, and who or what should have been affected by it, and how it should have been guarded and directed, it has independently, from its inauguration, proceeded to modify, qualify, rectify and purify, and sometimes to replace every nameable faulty condition, position, dogma or what, throughout this mundane world, inclusive of all 'ologies, 'isms and creeds. It has proven itself a veritable ever-effective leaven, whose apparent office has been to quicken and raise to better acceptance every social, political, theoretical and theological loaf. This not only has it done, but it is doing, and it seems destined ever to do, as proclaimed and enacted in the name of Science.

We often hear the questions, "What practical benefits has Spiritualism ever conferred to the world? What gift has it ever offered or made to science? Why, it has brought itself, and offered the same, body and soul, to science. It has laid at its door a multiplicity of well-attested facts, and offers for its consideration a multitudinous array of phenomena now enacting. No gift like it, as momentous or portentous, has ever been presented from other source. As an educator, as a power for solace, as a moral incentive, as a reformatory impulse, Spiritualism stands incomparable in its conferred great benefits to mankind.

Spiritualism, then, is a science, with a grand philosophy, and it stands side by side with all other great scientific developments, leading its followers, as they are directing their advocates, to a union of forces as humanitarians, that there may be more thoroughly established, exemplified and practiced the one great religion so needful, Humanitarianism. IT IS A SCIENCE.

Facts Are the Same Now and Forever.

You ask me, do I regard Spiritualism as a science or a religion? My answer is, a science.

All intelligent Spiritualists are "investigating truth for its own sake." They are diligently pursuing pure knowledge; they are endeavoring to understand truths and the great facts presented by Spiritualism. This makes them scientists rather than theologians or religionists. Facts are the same now and forever, and everywhere.

Religion is not based on facts, but on faith. When Moody was asked to give a reason for the religion he professed, he replied: "There is no reason in it. It is founded on faith." He spoke truly. That has been the position taken by the theologians of every system of religion in all the past. Tyrants like Constantine and Mohammed gave out their ideas of God, and then by torture and murder of those who differed from them, built up a religion. The God presented to-day by orthodox Christianity, whom the churches demand shall be obeyed and worshiped, is represented as a revengeful, short-sighted being, limited in knowledge and power, refusing to be reconciled toward his own children unless his only begotten son would consent to be crucified; moreover he ordained eternal, horrible torment to billions of men, women and children, because of the sin of a remote ancestor.

"Religion," says Webster, "is the recognition of God as an object of worship." But there are all sorts of religions—Hebrew, Catholic, Mohammedan, Mormon, Protestant, Pagan, Brahman, and scores of others. None agree as to the nature and attributes of God. Each sect denounces the God of all the others. The world has been drenched in blood by these warring religionists fighting each other. Most of the slavery, the wars, the superstitions and the colossal crimes and outrages of the past, were the direct results of disagreements about God. Even in this more enlightened age, billions of money is expended by the blind faithists in building temples to their God and in propagating the grossly false and immoral doctrines of total depravity, endless torment, election and reprobation, the vicarious atonement, and the existence of a ubiquitous devil who has been and is able to thwart God's plans.

All this is due to blind faith—to religion from which reason, facts, proof are excluded.

When Spiritualists stop "investigating truth for its own sake," when they cease the pursuit of knowledge, and organize themselves into a religious denomination, and agree on a definition of God, and then require their adherents to recognize, obey and worship that Deity, then they will become "religious" according to Webster's definition.

I hope that day may never come. Let Spiritualists stand for truth, for cold, hard facts—for progress. The more truth they discover, the greater knowledge they acquire, the more facts they perceive, the grander, nobler they will become.

Let religionists "go it blind" if they must; let them believe that their God will excuse their sins because of his son's sake, if they will; let them believe that God is pleased and flattered by holy incense, the fashion of the priest's coat, by immersing a sinner in water, by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of a slain Savior, etc.; but let the Spiritualist be an investigator, a thinker; let him follow where truth leads. Let him be a scientist first and all the time. If he thinks he will be happier to also be a religionist, let him adopt the creed of the immortal Thomas Paine, who said: "The world is my country, to do good is my religion."

SPIRITUALISM.

It Is Regarded as a Scientific Religion.

In response to the editor's courteous request for my opinion as to whether Spiritualism should be considered a religious organization among the other religious bodies, or should be relegated to the domain of science as a natural study for savants and non-savants, I would say that I sincerely regard Spiritualism as a scientific religion, for I cannot conceive of any religion which will conflict with the philosophy and science of living, being and doing.

Several thousand years ago, an old Grecian philosopher, Thales, said, "Man, know thyself." Confucius and Jesus expounded the Golden Rule. Thomas Paine, the author-hero of the Revolution, said "The world is my country, to do good is my religion." I do not believe that the religious problem has even been solved, racially or collectively, but that every man and woman must work out his or her own salvation from personal sins by solving the religious question for himself or herself. The world grows into its religion as the discoveries of our scientific people expand and become more useful. There must be a union of philosophy and science, and the two compose religion, but as no man knows not all there is of either, therefore, does not know all there is to know about religion. All the great established religions of the world have been ushered in with a train of spiritual phenomena and all the attendant features, such as hypnotism, telepathy, psychometry, clairvoyance, mental, magnetic and other forms of drugless healing of diseases and complaints grouped under the appropriate heads of suggestive therapeutics and psycho-therapy. Particularly among these great religious systems was that of Jesus, or in other words, Jehoshua, the Essene Therapeut. Just as soon as his presumed followers fell away from the psychical and physical phenomena attending his code of ethics, they became a soulless body of Pharisaical Sadducees squabbling over forms and ceremonies from which all the occult meanings had departed.

It is not necessary to point to any particular churchly institution in speaking of religion, for all have the basic principle of truth, however much they may stray away from it in forms. No man can thoroughly understand religion and not know all he can expect to learn and know of the secrets of nature which surround him on every hand. For example, take our cult. Primarily, everyone who has knowledge of the communion between the living and the so-called dead, is essentially a Spiritualist. But just as soon as he seeks to acquaint himself with the science and philosophy explaining the same, he is bound to accept it as a religion. The very thought of living again after death starts a train of thought as to the philosophy of existence and the scientific cause of life and death. It immediately opens the door to a flood of questions bearing upon Life, God, Existence, Natural Law, etc., and no churchly religionist can explain any of these things without running into the domain of philosophy and science. He can tell nothing about reward or punishment without doing so. The whole Problem of Life is wrapped up in the word "religion" and it cannot be solved without scientific aid, therefore I positively assert that every religion must be a scientific religion, and the basic principle must be truth, with the branch-roots of Be-Good and Do-Good.

Hard-headed scientific men, many of whom rejected the soulless religions of the day, have come to Spiritualism with open arms as the great Want for which they long had sought, and mourned because they found it not, vide: Varley and Edison, the electricians; Crookes, the chemist; Wallace and Denton, the naturalists; Flammarion, the astronomer; Baron Reichenbach, and others, among them the greatest philosophers, scientists, physicians, scholars and statesmen in the world.

Therefore, my concept of religion not being acceptable to the Methodist or Mohammedan, and that of the Zulu, Hottentot or Australian Bushman to neither of us, it merely resolves the question of religion into what we know and what we don't know. We know by learning, and no one can learn without the use of philosophy and science, and the whole matter resolves itself into one proposition at last.

I should be glad to see every expounder and instructor of our grand religion travel free from one end of the country to the other. It would be little recompense for the great work they are doing. That ultimate success may crown all efforts to do good, ought to be the prayer of every true Spiritualist.

PERTINENT.

A Religion of the Higher Order.

The question on my table, viz., "Should Spiritualism be classed as a religion or a science," is a pertinent one, and I am glad it has been taken up.

For my part I believe it can be classified as being both religious and scientific and I believe it should be so looked upon.

There can be but little doubt about the scientific side of Spiritualism, and I believe no one who is at all progressive, or up to date, will attempt to deny that fact.

Anything that is the result of an immutable and natural law, and is demonstrable through and by that law, appears to me to be scientific in the highest sense of the term.

If we were to look upon Spiritualism as meaning only phenomenal evidence, and as containing nothing but the fact that it were possible, under certain conditions for discarnate intelligences to manifest their presence, then I should say most emphatically, relegate Spiritualism to the realm of sciences, and go no further.

However, to my way of thinking, there is infinitely more than the phenomenal side of Spiritualism to be considered, and I believe, that not until we do consider that other side of spirit return will we understand it as thoroughly as we should.

I know, as do thousands upon thousands of others, that the phenomena of Spiritualism are a fact of the most positive kind. Many have applied the most thorough scientific tests to the phenomena, and they have stood the test, and gained victory after victory. To such an extent has this been so, that no intelligent man or woman will deny these facts to-day. To do so is equivalent to labeling themselves ignorant.

It is true, as set forth in the circular before me, that much that comes from that other phase of life is of an indifferent character, there being good and bad, useful, and useless, communications, etc., and yet this very fact has taught me more of the life than I possibly could have learned, had it all been either good or bad.

Nothing shows the fallibility of human nature as clearly as these indifferent and diverse manifestations. Nor are we made acquainted with our shortcomings, so forcibly by anything, as we are by coming in contact with the higher intelligences.

By no means would I advise anyone to stop at the phenomena, as I believe that by so doing we lose the best side of Spiritualism. I am quite satisfied to look upon spiritual phenomena as being purely scientific and yet it is this very thing that makes me look upon the philosophy as a religion of the higher order.

Of course, if we look upon religion as meaning creeds, cult, sect, blind worship, etc., then I should say the less of that we have the better for all concerned.

I believe the principal fault to be found with the religions of the past and present, is the fact of their unscientific foundation. That style of religion has been tried and found wanting, and the consequence is only too evident. To my way of thinking, true religion must be builded upon scientific fact, or it loses all real value.

Spiritualism and its natural phenomena offer a scientific basis upon which to build a religion of the very highest type. We don't need creeds and blind worship, we want something practical and useful. That we may find if we wish, in connection with truth and fact.

It matters little to me whether the spirit who communicates is an ex-criminal, or not, but it matters much to me whether that spirit demonstrates a truth or not, and if by that communication I, or any one else is made a better man or woman, I claim that we have a foundation for the highest kind of a scientific religion.

The fact that my parents can return to me and communicate is no more sacred to me than the fact that they are my parents, and yet these communications inspire me with more truly religious sentiment than anything else I know. I should not like to see anyone try to patent or copyright the phenomena of Spiritualism, but I do not believe Spiritualists desire anything of that kind.

Spiritual phenomena are not one whit more sacred than any other natural phenomena, but that fact does not detract from their value in the least.

Let us have a truly natural, scientific religion, from which all unnecessary forms, creeds, and fallacies have been eliminated, and we shall get along much better than we are doing.

Through these phenomena we have been placed in touch with intelligences, etc., that have done more toward overcoming harshness, and introducing humanitarianism than any other force we know of.

To me the best part of any phenomenon is the philosophy connected therewith.

In everything we can find a philosophy that appeals to our highest self, if we only make the effort, and I believe that is the side we should all try to understand. As for the tendency to make a religion of Spiritualism, I can see nothing injurious in that, as long as we remain natural and do not make of it a creedal fetish to worship.

And as for organization, by all means let us have organization and co-operation; we need it sadly.

Good rational, humanitarian organization and co-operation with a good solid, scientifically religious basis, never injured any one. Let us have a little more of it, and creeds will have but little show with humanity. Spiritualism offers many advantages, if we will only accept them.

I can only hope we may soon see the day when we will understand the science and religion of Spiritualism.

HIGHER IDEALS.

The Religion of Spiritualism.

Man is a religious being. The religious instinct in man is the craving of the soul for expression, for something higher, something diviner, and these ideals lead him step by step up the spiral stairway of progress to more exalting elevations in the realm of thought.

The primitive religions of the world seem to have been of fear closely allied to the passions and the misconception of nature and her laws. But as the religious ideas became less material and gross, these were displaced by higher conceptions of god and the laws governing matter and force, and to-day man has an exalted religion, intellectual and allied to justice and mercy and the brotherhood of the human race.

Since the religious instinct in man is the best in man, does it not follow that through these different forms and teachings comes the stimulous to virtue, progress, and all moral attainments which man has reached?

In the most primitive conception of religious thought comes the slow workings of eternal wisdom according to the light and power of the intellect to grasp the truth. Every man is made better by his religion, and every form of religious service, however crude, is to the devotee his highest ideals of beauty and divine love, and every religion is and has been the means of making man better and more spiritual. Instead of finding fault with the religious and forms of religions, the word God, Infinite Intelligence, prayer and the offering of invocations at the opening of our spiritual meetings, let us be more mindful of the needs of others and the good these religious forms may be to some sorrowing soul seeking spiritual truth, and be thankful that all can be fed in some way at the divine Master's bountiful table.

Wasting time over speculations as to the merits and demerits of the prevailing sects Christian and otherwise, and forgetting the principles embodied in the higher religion, to visit the sick and the fatherless, to comfort the mourner's heart, and through the golden doorway of mediumship to prove the soul's immortality. Then as Spiritualists let us be thankful that the religious teachings are various and meet the soul wants of all grades of intellects, and with the present knowledge of spirit communion as based upon facts both ancient and modern, we can hopefully look to the future to give us a religion of Spiritualism.

IMPORTANT QUESTION.

Spiritual Phenomena the Basis for a Grand Science.

Shall Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the day, or shall it be assigned to its proper place in the domain of science?

To answer this question reasonably, we must of necessity go back at least, to the early days of those religions, and study their origin, and notice some of the points in their history and their present standing.

In this article I shall use the word "worship" as meaning religious reverence, homage, paying honor to an infinite God.

We find in a far remote period, prior to the Christian era the people had come to believe in an all-wise and all-powerful personality, whom they believed was the creator and ruler of the little, yet all of nature, that they could comprehend. They saw his love in the warm sunshine and balmy air, they saw his anger in the earthquake, the tempest and the lightning's flash, they heard his angry voice in the mighty crash and roar of the thunder; in their ignorance and fear they fell down in worship and prayer till the storm was past.

Yes, through ignorance and fear they began to worship.

Prior to the Christian era they had come to believe in an unknown God and devil, and they believed that "all the phenomena of nature both physical and spiritual" was but their expression.

Now we find in the bible that wherever the term "word of God" is used, it does not refer to the bible or any written word, but directly to the spoken word of the prophet, seer, or medium, whom they called "the man of God." Then all that class of phenomena that was not understood was supposed to be the special act of God, and according to the bible, when Christ came before the world, he did many miracles, hence he was called "the son of God."

Yet to-day we know there is not, and never has been a miracle; we know that Nature's laws are unchangeable, and whatsoever phenomena occurred in those days could occur to-day, under like circumstances.

Most assuredly we find the real phenomena of those days identical with the spiritual phenomena of to-day. Then is it unreasonable to say that spiritual phenomena was the original base upon which the Christian religion was builded? Indeed, no.

But during the misty past with its torture and crime in the name of God, its horrible wars and rivers of blood, where each army prayed to, worshiped, and fought for their all-wise and all-powerful God, we find them grown strong in their belief in the infinite, yet far away from the teachings of the meek and lowly medium, Jesus, whose phenomena were the very basis of their religion, and should he come to-day and proclaim himself they would condemn and crucify, or drive him away to the Spiritualists, the only organization on earth that could receive him.

We have absolute proof that our spirit friends produce spirit phenomena, which proof we could not have if said phenomena were "the expression of infinite intelligence."

And here the question arises: As Spiritualists with our knowledge of spirit communion, do we wish to accept the same thought that was accepted by the Christian world nineteen hundred years ago, and pray to, worship, and fight for "infinite intelligence," in fact, follow the course they followed, finally to arrive at practically the same condition, namely, a belief out of harmony with nature, and without a basis, faith without works?

Or would we prefer to accept the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism as facts in harmony with nature, and coming direct from our spirit friends?

True we find some who are ready to take the backward step, some who are speaking as inspired speakers, who would drive our phenomena from our rostrum, proclaim infinite intelligence as the source of all phenomena, and establish a priestcraft, which is sure to follow the general acceptance of the N. S. A. declaration of principles.

The first act of which is shown in trying to drive our phenomena from the rostrum.

And here let me ask a question, do you find a belief in infinite intelligence essential to a belief in or knowledge of Spiritualism? Most assuredly no, for a belief in Spiritualism is always based on spiritual phenomena and philosophy, and since these phenomena do not in any instance demonstrate supernaturalism, but are invariably in perfect harmony with natural law and conditions, wherever man has freed himself from the bonds of superstition and ignorance, sufficient to discover the same; hence we find no religion, no object of worship in the phenomena, or the medium through which it is presented.

These, like the physical phenomena, are plain, every day demonstrable facts in nature, and however much we love and admire the beauty of the woodlands, rivers and lakes, the majesty of the snow-capped mountain, the grandeur of old ocean's rolling wave or broad expense, or, the sweet communion with the loved ones gone before, yet we would not worship either.

No, indeed; Spiritualism is not a religion in the sense that there is anything in either phenomena or philosophy that indicates that there is a God having power over man's destiny, to whom obedience, service and honor are due; nothing to cause us to love, or live in fear and awe of, some supernatural overruling power.

We find that all knowledge has resulted from the study of the phenomena of nature, as one and one are two, not because man has said so, but because it is a fact governed by the supreme principles and laws of nature. Man came in contact with the phenomena, and his requirements compelled him to study the natural laws and principles governing them, resulting in the science of mathematics.

The subtle current of galvanic electricity was discovered about 125 years ago. For a hundred years its growth was slow. Much phenomena occurred, but it was not classified and understood. The masses looked upon it with superstitious awe, and even to-day, in presenting spiritual phenomena, the majority account for it as being fraud, produced by the aid of electricity, of which they have no knowledge, while ministers, being unable to explain it, call it the works of the devil, of which they absolutely know nothing. So all things not understood, are always attributed to something else that is not known, or understood. Nevertheless, to understand and handle electricity is getting to be a grand science.

Now as we know that spiritual phenomena, like electrical phenomena, is in the realm of, and governed by the principles and laws of nature, even as are hypnotism, telepathy or soul communion, clairvoyance and the subtle psychological forces, we as Spiritualists should be careful not to cover these known facts from sight, by a simple belief in and worship of an undemonstrated supernatural God.

But on the contrary, we should investigate and classify the phenomena, study the laws that govern, demonstrate the philosophy, and build up the science of the soul, until we can know and teach the methods of communion with our lost and loved, and point out the path of life that will lead to a broader humanitarianism, and higher civilization on earth, and point the way to that purer and higher happiness in the land of light and love,

Where soul may join soul
In love's holy clime,
And go hand in hand
Down the ages of time.

Yes, spiritual phenomena are the basis for a grander science than the world has ever known.

VITAL QUESTIONS.

Will Mark an Epoch in History.

I have received your courteous and suggestive circular letter containing vital questions for decision relative to the present and future of Spiritualism and "what is (or should be) its exact status considered from a religious, philosophical or scientific standpoint?"

The character and trend of these decisions (for which momentous crisis all liberal minds await with expectant interest) will mark a most significant epoch in the history of Modern Spiritualism and its ultimate destiny as an exalted force for the development of mankind; or, whether it shall be ruled by the great Moloch of Superstition, weighted down with senseless ceremonies, hedged in by crude conceptions regarding the unchangeable laws of nature, and finally crushed beneath the juggernaut of poular belief and tyrant custom.

To answer your questions correctly would require a practical knowledge of the nature and tendencies, for good or evil, of the complex teaching of the church which holds the masses in religious bigotry, and I regret my inability at present to do this, and give Christians and Christian Spiritualists, especially, (whose anomalistic views make them natural targets for radical sharpshooters,) the polite (?) thrashing they deserve for sins committed in their attempt to perpetuate the ill-timed and insignificant doctrines of a past and useless age. Yet, I trust that capable correspondents will reply efficiently to this important subject, not only in regard to the proper status of Spiritualism, (or rather, Spiritual Science) as a natural, all-positive principle for the cultivation of the race, but who will sift, define and demonstrate to all the many weak points and puerile assumptions of religionists at large.

I find religion a disease more difficult to remedy than the old-time complaint, for the cure of which the good mothers gave sulphur and molasses, and thus in attempting to answer your questions, several side issues, bearing upon the sanity of religionists, though rather irrelevant to the subject in hand, are suggested for solution, and which I have no doubt will be fully discussed and solved to my satisfaction in future numbers of The Progressive Thinker. This rather long preface, foreign to the real point at issue, finally reminds me to say,

First, that the true or exact status of Spiritualism can only be fully comprehended by unbiased investigation of its merits as a purely natural principle, and should be viewed from a philosophical or scientific standpoint, excluding all religions or religious influences, since they inculcate blind belief in an incomprehensible deity. Its ethical value cannot be estimated by the limited investigation of material science as taught upon the world plane. A more exalted knowledge of laws governing spirit force must be gained, which under proper conditions may be imparted in accordance to our receptiveness and earnest desire for the truth.

Second, would I make its phenomena the foundation for a new creed, sect, system of worship or basis of a religious cult? Emphatically, no! That would be silly impudence and a most ignoble slur upon the beneficent intentions of exalted intelligences, who, ever seeking the spiritual unfoldment of mind to comprehend the subtle forces of the universe from a natural, instead of supernatural view-point, have made its present demonstrative power possible. To attempt to force it into the slough of other great (?) religions, would prove a ridiculous episode in its checkered history, sinking it to the dead level of miasmic superstition and vain, earthly concepts; dragging it through the muck of mercenary motives, and clothing it in the vesture of senseless formalities. This would be no step ahead toward the summit of intellectual supremacy, but a retrograde movement to the fetish proclivities of old-time orthodoxy. Spiritualism cannot be absorbed by enthusiastic creedists or worldly manipulators in the interest of a fancied "Elder Brother," (a vague term devoid of significance, as regards our duty to one another,) since all should be "Brothers in Truth" without seeking the vain worship of suppositious personalities or degrading idols. Even if dragged to this plane by majority rule and merged, seemingly, in the formulas of a weak-minded populace, easily tickled with their ultra views of unlimited progression, it would then bear only the shadow of resemblance to its true principles, and never the positive representative of standard liberal thought which bubbles without parade from the fountain of the infinite.

PERSONAL MAGNETISM.

A College, Chartered Under State Laws, With a Capital of $100,000, for the Purpose of Teaching Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism by Correspondence.

EVERYBODY MAY NOW LEARN

Ten Thousand Copies of a Valuable Work on These Sciences to Be Given Away to Advertise th College.

The American College of Sciences, of Philadelphia, Pa., is a novel institution. It is chartered under state laws, with a capital of $100,000, for the purpose of teaching Personal Magnetism, Hypnotism, Magnetic Healing, etc., by correspondence.

At an expense of over $5,000 the college has issued a remarkable work on these sciences, ten thousand copies of which will be given away absolutely free. The book is elegantly illustrated with the most expensive engravings, and it is decidedly the finest and most comprehensive work of its kind ever published. It is the product of the combined talent of thirty distinguished hypnotic specialists and scientists. It thoroughly explains all the hidden secrets of Personal Magnetism, Hypnotism, Magnetic Healing, etc. It is full of surprising experiences, and makes many startling disclosures in regard to the use and possibilities of this secret power.

The college absolutely guarantees that anyone can learn these sciences in a few days at home, and use the power without the knowledge of his most intimate friends.

The reporter asked for the names and addresses of some of the pupils so that he might communicate with them personally. Several hundred were offered, from which the reporter selected eighty-four. The replies received were more than sufficient to convince the most skeptical in regard to the wonderful benefits to be derived from this mighty power. There were absolutely no failures. All had learned to make practical use of the sciences. The following extracts are taken at random from the letters, for the benefit of readers:

J. H. Schneller, 1412 Avon st., La Crosse, Wis., writes: "Hypnotism truly reveals the secrets of life and the mysteries of nature. My own father could not have convinced me of its wonderful power if I had not actually tested it for myself. I consider a knowledge of it invaluable to those who wish to get the most out of life: to those who wish to achieve success and live up to the full measures of their possibilities.

Mrs. Edie M. Watson, Martinsville, Ind., writes: "Hypnotism opens the road to health, happiness, and prosperity. It should be studied by every one. I would not part with my knowledge of it for any amount. The instructions have developed within me a force of character, an ability to influence and control people that I did not dream I could acquire.

J. W. Clinger, M. D., Springfield, Ohio, writes: "I have used the methods of hypnotism taught by the American College of Sciences in two cases of difficult surgical operations with perfect success. It is a complete anaesthetic, and preferable to chloroform or ether. I acquired a practical knowledge of hypnotism in less than three days. The book is grand."

Rev. T. W. Butler, Ph. D., Idaho City, Idaho, writes "I have cured a number of chronic cases of rheumatism, dyspepsia and paralysis of long standing; have not had a single failure; I consider a knowledge of Personal Magnetism invaluable. The book has greatly increased my own powers.

Dr. W. P. Kennicutt, 529 State st., Binghamton, N. Y., writes: "I had long suffered from nervous prostration and dyspepsia. My case baffled all medical skill. I studied hypnotism from the American College of Sciences, and tried it upon myself with surprising results. In one week my stomach was better than it had been in thirty years. I could eat anything without the slightest distress. I can hypnotize myself in five minutes and sleep all night; have hypnotized a number of others.

The first ten thousand persons who write to the American College of Sciences will receive, absolutely free, the marvelous book that brought success to the above persons. It is intensely interesting from start to finish. It should be in every home. If you want a copy write to-day to the American College of Sciences, Dept. PL 12, 416-420 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa., and you will receive the book by return mail.

Worthy of Being Pondered.

In the matter of the Morris Pratt Institute, there is a very important point that should be given due consideration and allowed its full weight by all interested in the development and growth of the cause of Spiritualism.

It is said, and it is true, that a knowledge of grammar and other very important equipments of one who would pose as a public speaker, may be obtained in the public schools of our country; and this fact is given as a sufficient reason for taking the stand that there is no necessity for a distinctively Spiritualist institution of learning.

It should not escape the attention of Spiritualists that there is something more needed than the education given in the grand common schools of our land, and the education of the higher schools, academies, and the state and denominational colleges and universities.

It is patent that the animus of the education of these colleges and universities is one of prejudice and animosity toward Spiritualism, with which influence the student mind quite naturally becomes imbued.

And even the common school education, good as it is, and as far as it goes, gives no help in matters of vital import to us as Spiritualists. So far as a general education is concerned, our public schools are admirable; and the denominational colleges carry the work still further—but tinged with the respective denominational proclivities with reference to their special doctrines and interests.

The Spiritual teacher, writer, lecturer, of the present and future, needs to be equiped with a generous general education, and in addition, a knowledge of Spiritualism in all its phases, its science, its philosophy, its ethics, and whatsoever pertains thereto. It is a knowledge not to be obtained in the state and denominational colleges; but which, in a Spiritualist college, would be made prominent, and become very useful.

It is quite common for orthodox people, especially ministers, to throw bible clubs—texts—at Spiritualists. Under Moses Hull's capable administration, as he has shown in several of his published books, his students will learn how to capture the orthodox munitions of war, and turn the fire of their own ordnance against themselves. In these days of orthodox opposition, it is a matter of much importance that the Spiritualist writer and speaker shall be efficiently armed and fortified against assaults from orthodox bible people.

Further, in addition to meeting the onslaughts of rampant orthodoxy, the Spiritualist worker should be qualified to meet the generally more gentlemanly attacks of modern Materialism, and with knowledge and logic, reinforced by practical experience in Spiritual phenomena, and the history thereof, be able to cope with materialistic arguments at every turn.

Such are some of the advantages to be derived from a distinctively Spiritualist college education, above and beyond any and all other educational equipments.

We think Spiritualists will see that this is a subject worthy of being deeply pondered, looking solely to the interests of Spiritualism.

Woman to the Front.

Each revolving year shows that the churches are slipping away from their base. They fight reforms and new discoveries for a while, then adopt them, and struggle to make Bible teaching harmonize with the revelations of science. Bruno and Servetus were burned for teachings truths incompatible with divine revelation, and Galileo narrowly escaped with his life. Copernicus wisely withheld his wonderful discoveries until death had him in his grasp, hence escaped inquisitorial tortures. Woman was enslaved by command of an old monk known to us as the apostle Paul. "I suffer no one to teach. Let her learn of her husband at home." It is claimed near nineteen hundred years have passed since then. During all that long period until recent times the evangelical churches have been a unit in enforcing Paul's cruel demands.

About the time Spiritualism began to take form, some fifty years ago, a change came over popular opinion. Churchmen, the more liberal of them, began to see the injustice they were doing the sisters. Universalists and Unitarians dared defy Paul, and welcomed the proscribed sex to their pulpits. Orthodox churches saw they were losing their grasp, and agitation was begun, and has gone on favoring enlargement of the powers of Woman. That movement lately culminated with the Methodists, by amending their constitution by a three-fourths vote, permitting them to be elected and seated as delegates in their Conferences and Conventions.

We are not sure but the agitation this subject had received among Spiritualists contributed largely to bring about this result. Certain it is, no hostility to the enlargement of woman's services has come from its press or the members of its societies; on the contrary, the large numbers of the best women in the world, and the most intelligent withal, laboring in our ranks, have done much towards arousing public opinion in the direction indicated.

Our Dumb Animals.

"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." This wise saying is attributed to Jesus and will be found in the 7th verse of the fifth chapter of Matthew of the Christian's Bible. Whether he ever said it or not makes no difference here, and seemingly but little difference with the average inhabitant of this Christian(?) land whether it was ever said by any one, but there is wisdom in the saying, from the highest Spiritual standpoint.

Upon this point let us dwell upon the almost common treatment of the most faithful, the most useful and the most abused animal on earth, the horse, first.

How common it is, especially in Chicago or any large city where there is so much teaming done, to see a man (or a brute who calls himself a man) beating his horse to make him pull a load far beyond his power to pull. After he has worked all day and had a half peck of oats for his dinner, he is driven into a mud hole, or smooth shod or unshod over an icy crossing, and he has pulled every ounce possible, his brutal master "lays on the gad" and the poor animal squirms and jerks and writhes and cannot move the loaded cart an inch, then the master beats him over the head with his whip-stock in a most cruel manner. This is an everyday occurrence in this big city, and the man or woman who watches such a proceeding without a protest, or a hickory club, is either a coward or a soulless being.

The lightest punishment would be arrest and a fine in every case, but even that would lessen this cruelty. Take the number and name on his cart, get his name and his address, and report him to the proper authorities at once and take an hour or two off and appear against him and see that the unmerciful shall obtain no mercy, but receive the full penalty the law prescribes for him.

Upon this subject we quote from an editorial in a recent Chicago American the following well chosen bit of sound sense on this subject:

"Fancy a dumb, patient and willing animal, quivering with fear at every blow, struggling to its feet and falling again to receive more brutal punishment because its owner has compelled it to tempt the icy pavements SMOOTH SHOD instead of ROUGH SHOD.

"You can see instances of such brutality on the streets any day.

"We don't dare to treat human beings with such unreason and injustice, because THEY would find some means of striking back.

"We think such a brutal driver should be imprisoned, without the option of a fine. His license, if he has one, should be taken away until he learns to be just, if not kind, to his horses."

It is not a good recommend to our Christian(?) civilization when there must be compulsory laws to prevent cruelty to our beloved dumb animals, to compel kindness to our most useful animal, the horse.

For Progressive Thinkers.

What would be said of the farmer who should sow his seed, or plant his corn or potatoes in a forest filled with briars, brambles, and clinging vines, with the expectation that he was to gather a luxurious harvest? Would not the presumption follow that he was insane, certainly was ignorant of the laws governing vegetable production? All know the agitation of the soil would increase the growth of the verdure already having root, and that a new growth would be smothered and would scarcely sprout for want of air and light.

The pioneers in an open timbered country occasionally girdle the large trees, then, having removed the undergrowth, plant the intervening space, and hope for a harvest; but so far as our observation is concerned the crops were light, not a quarter what they would have been had the shade been removed which blighted the production and nearly prevented a harvest. Not only is sunlight intercepted by the standing trees, but the moisture is absorbed by overhanging branches, and the free air which waves the growing grain is shut out to the detriment of the husbandman.

Does not a similar law prevail in the social world? A field already occupied by opposing societies is a poor one in which to establish and build up a new society. The people must be convinced of the falsity of the old faith as well as indoctrinated into the new.

The plowshare that destroys the roots of the vine makes the soil receptive to the farmer's seed. The trees and copse removed, and nothing remaining to shut out the needed light, heat and moisture, we can count on an abundant harvest, and the farmer will be well rewarded for his toil in planting and cultivating. So a new faith, founded on natural truths, backed by reason and common sense, has little show when blighted by error and ignorance. Teach the truth; expose the errors of the old creeds and show they were the productions of an uncultured and unlettered age; that their precepts are demoralizing; their promised rewards not to be trusted; and their threats of endless torture groundless; then we can rely with confidence on the fulfillment of a promise, with abiding results, in building up the new faith founded on the wisdom of the immortals.

University Professor on Hypnotism.

Many times has it been maintained in these columns that the process known as the "new birth" in the churches, is nothing more than hypnotism; that the subject is psychologized, and suggestion does the rest. It was hardly expected the clerics whose bread and butter is contingent on the deception, would see the matter in this light; but the recent statement of Dr. Geo. A. Coe, professor of Mental Philosophy in the Northwestern University, located in this city, and under control of the Baptists, falls little short of such an admission.

The Doctor lately hypnotized three students in one of his classes, to prove his theory, that suggestion is the active agent in the hands of the divine healers, such as Christian Scientists, Dowieites, and all mesmerists. He said their pretentions of being instruments of God are absurd, as any careful student of psychology can demonstrate by watching the healers' methods. He illustrated his claim by causing his hypnotized students to follow his control.

The same law governs in conversions. The so-called evangelist is uniformly a strong, vigorous man, with powerful hypnotic powers. He commands attention by his passionate appeals. Once under influence the subject is enslaved to another's will, and believes anything the master teaches. Long years are frequently required to escape such influence.

The power in the hands of good men may serve a valuable purpose, but in the past it has been principally but ignorantly used in aid of a soul-crushing superstition.

Method in Madness.

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," and just at present the gods of Methodism are "making mad" all the old fogies of creed and superstition, over a few facts they have inspired one of the great leaders of their flock to make public declaration of. He has been called everything by those who had previously pinned their confidence to his intellect and Methodistic proclivities.

In their estimation their "pink of perfection" suddenly turned black, very black; their idol of a Prof. crumbled and became the vilest dust of the earth; their bright and shining light went out.

Prof. Pearson had simply been reasoning for himself, and that is a dangerous thing for a Methodist. He had unfolded and developed till the narrow confines of Methodism was cramping him and wisely and well concluded to free his mind and tell the truth even if it should cost him his good position. He dared to deny the infallibility of the Bible. He dared to say that Christ was the son of God only as all are, and was begotten through the same laws of nature. He dared to be a man and would not retract any of his statements, and for these things these good brothers in the cause of Christ would "skin him and hang his hide upon the barn door and salt it." What an expression for a follower of the "meek and lowly Jesus" to make of a brother, no matter what the crime.

It is the same old, old story, and Prof. Pearson's conscience cannot let him go back into the church and profess what he does not believe. He aims for the Unitarian church, but will no doubt emulate Dr. Thomas, Prof. Swing, and many others, and start a church of his own where he can give his mind its entire freedom.

The poor old churches will soon have to invent some new attraction or close their "precious" doors and sink into eternal decay.

Nearly Obsolete Custom.

During the last generation it was very rare to see any family begin a meal without grace, but the omission of this ceremony is becoming more common every day in some sections. It seems there is a like decline of the custom in England. An English writer who observed this tendency for several years, and is much pained by it, declares the abandonment of grace before meals is "the most notable change in private religious observance in London." The Springfield, Mass., Republican makes the surprising declaration that "saying the blessing" is still observed on "many" public occasions, but it is comparatively seldom heard in New England families, even when descended from Puritans who have inherited the whole body of Puritan traditions."—Ex.

It is said the economical Ben Franklin, when a boy, assisting his father to pack a barrel of pork for family use, proposed to his paternal ancestor to ask grace over the entire barrel, and save the accustomed waste of time in asking for such a favor at each meal.

The people in this utilitarian age have caught the spirit of the juvenile Ben, and are utilizing the moments in money making instead of asking for baksheesh from the Great Ruler.

The Lord Was at Fault.

Because of an error of one day in an almanac for the month of November, the entire town of Sweden, N. Y., was lately misled as to dates. Stores were open all day Sunday and business was very brisk under the impression it was Saturday. The Baptist preacher went fishing with the Supervisor. Everything was turned topsey turvey. The Monday previous was observed as Sunday, and church services went on as if a Joshua had influenced the Lord to disarrange the established order of things. Such a condition would never have happened if the Great Ruler had used a blue or red light to designate his holy day from other days. The blame should rest on the Lord in this matter, not on the misled and mistaken fisherman, whose place was in the pulpit.

The Hull-Jamieson Debate.

Owing to the crowded state of our columns, and the fact that the debate is not yet fully written out by the reporters, and is liable to another break, we have concluded to not publish it in the paper, but put it in book form for future reference of all students of our philosophy. Next week we will resume the publication of the remarkable letters from the spirit world, by Carlyle Petersilea.

A New Phase of Mediumship.

To the Editor:—I wish to thank you for your courtesy and kindness in publishing my article regarding my work in this city in its entirety. The notice in question has brought me several enquiries, and I am now busy arranging dates. However, I expect to have several dates open, and would like to communicate with societies or camps desiring my services. My phase of mediumship is, I believe, something entirely new, and as I have received many enquiries regarding the modus operandi, please allow me to explain. After my lecture I take a large piece of black crayon and sketch pictures of the spirit friends of members of the audience. The paper on which the work is done is about 24 x 28 inches in size, and the pictures in profile and full-face fill the surface of the paper. With them I give names or some test to establish the identity. One instance will suffice. Last Sunday evening I drew the picture of a lady, and speaking to a lady in the audience, I said, "Lady, this picture is for you. It is some one whom you have never seen in earth life, but you will find a duplicate of this picture hanging on the left-hand wall of your front sitting-room." The lady recognizing it, said, "Yes, sir, that is correct; that is a picture of my grandmother." The lady was an entire stranger to the medium. I use this instance, only that interested people may understand more fully the work I do.

On Sunday, Feb. 9, we had a peculiar phenomenon; two voices sang independent. Several in the front of the audience heard the voices, tenor and soprano, joining in the singing. They were my artist guides, Dr. Grace and Louise, and it was through the power of Mr. Pearce, the president, who is a very good non-professional trumpet medium, that they were thus enabled to manifest.

When I came to this society of Fort Wayne, on Dec. 23, its workers tell me it was at a very low ebb. In spite of the severity of the weather, our attendance has been fairly good. I shall serve the society until the last of February, and should be pleased to hear from societies desiring my services after that date.

SPIRITS AND CLOCKS.

Mediumistic Experiences in Boston

Some of the most thrilling incidents in spirit phenomenon have occurred inside of clocks, showing how the invisible forces have often used such inanimate objects as an evidence of their presence.

A few months since, there was a report started in Boston that the police had notified all spirit mediums to remove the signs, etc., from their doors and windows.

Desiring to verify this report and if true, to make arrangements for the repeal of such an order, I visited, among a few other mediums, Mrs. A. D. Morgan, now located at 904 Fremont street, Boston.

She said a policeman in citizen's clothes had visited her as a private detective, but when she saw clairvoyantly that he had a policeman's badge hidden under his coat, and so informed him—much to his chagrin—he concluded that not all mediums were fakirs.

She is called "The Rapping Medium," etc. While in her parlor she showed me a little clock with quite an interesting history, and finally asked her spirits to rap inside the clock for me, which they did a number of times. She says that her spirits can answer spoken or mental questions by giving one, two or three raps, for no, doubtful, or yes. These raps I heard were tiny, but very audible and distinct.

That spirits can exert their powers to stop, start or strike clocks is now quite well established by hundreds of well authenticated incidents. In one of the leading clock establishment in the East, there is a large regulator clock which is never allowed to stop or vary in time. The pendulum is a patented, adjustable affair which allows for heat expension, etc., and is very reliable. One noon hour this clock was stopped and no one knew how it was done, as no one had touched it. The only cause which could be thought of to fit in with all the known facts and conditions of the case, was spirit forces. Employes here have heard the spirits rap at certain moments when it was time to perform special duties. Noises were made loud enough to be heard at least 200 feet away. These sounds were generally made in dark places where the spirits could more easily concentrate their forces; as it is well known that strong light tends to neutralize the power; much as it does in photography, which requires a dark cabinet to develop the negatives.

One blacksmith, a Catholic, engaged in this place, said he had felt the spirits give him a push which almost made him fall headforemost to the floor. At first he thought some one had pushed him who worked for the company, but on quickly looking around he could see no one present. At another time he had heard a crash behind him as if a large glass dish or pitcher had been smashed to pieces at his feet, but on looking around there was no broken glass, crockery or anything else. Everything was as he had left them, and no person was anywhere near the place. His little girl had gone to bed at night, while he read in the next room, and although there was but one door leading to the bed-room, she had suddenly called him, saying, "Papa, come quick! Some one is pulling the clothes off the bed." He rushed in through the only doorway with the lamp, and saw the clothes going over the end of the bed, but not a human being was present except himself and his daughter. They had had many similar experiences and believed they were done by the spirit forces.

A watchman said that one night he was going around through a very dangerous spot in the cellar of the great building. He had just passed one of the large safes and was about to go through a low door-way leading into an underground tunnel, when he felt something come by his head with a peculiar "swish" sound, as if it had rushed suddenly to him. He was so surprised at the unusual occurrence that he took out his watch to see the time. It was 1:30 a. m. The next morning while he was eating his breakfast in a lodging-house, they handed him a telegram from a distant city. He opened it and read: "Please come home to your wife's relatives. She died last night about 1:30 a. m." The very time to the minute when he was aware of something (probably his wife's spirit) coming to him while he was at work miles away.

At Mrs. A. C. Littlefield's studio, 218 Columbus avenue, there is a French marble clock on the mantel which strikes the half-hours. Some time ago this clock refused to go, and despite a great deal of attention and study, no cause could be found for its "balky" spell. The medium had despaired of ever seeing the clock go unless taken to pieces by an expert. She ordered it removed to a jeweler's, when, lo, and behold, it started going itself, without any one knowing it until they heard it ticking.

In her "spirit laboratory," as she calls it, where she has her cabinet, she has a large music box. Twice this box stopped in the midst of pieces, without any human hand touching it. All those present thought it had broken down. An expert looked at it and it was O. K. The lever for stopping the instrument had been turned by invisible forces.

The first time this lady entered a strange cabinet, the spirits rang bells, floated musical instruments, etc., about her, showing that they could exert a power in her presence.

A Few Words on an Important Subject.

I was much interested in the article on "Insanity," by A. F. Hill, in No. 637 of The Progressive Thinker. I quite agree with him in his views on the subject. When once the asylum doors are closed upon the unfortunate patient, they are virtually buried from the outside world. Then the work of retrogression commences, and nature is reversed, by turning the bright light of man, or womanhood, to the dullness, apathy, brutal stupidity, or mulish obstinacy of the animal. The victim is fattened in many cases like the lower order of animals, his little remaining light of reason "blown out," and his animal obstinacy first induced, and then punished for asserting itself, by the cruel attendants, who cannot reason beyond the narrow limitations of their own minds.

Kindness, mental science, and suggestions, are potent factors in restoring a diseased mind to perfect health; drugs are worthless. I know the value of these things, for I am in daily attendance upon this unfortunate class. If the reader wishes to learn more upon this subject, you can address me at 177 John street, Toronto, Canada.

Our Symposium.

This week we complete our Symposium, embracing two of the most remarkable papers ever issued from the Spiritualistic press—both of them worth at least a year's subscription to the paper.

MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE

Answers to Questions Concerning the Same.

So many questions are being asked relative to the College or Institute, that I take this means of answering in a general way, that it may be more thoroughly understood.

We are asked. What is the price of scholarship? What is membership in the Association, and each year's dues? How many teachers will be employed, and what standing they have? What branches will be taught? How can board be had, and at what price? Will men and women both be accepted as pupils, and how long will it take to make mediums and speakers of the students?

1. Scholarship is fifty dollars per year, regular school of 36 weeks, and we trust there will be many who will assist in providing a fund that will enable some who are not situated so they can afford that amount, yet are bright and intelligent, and desire an education such as can be had at that institute, and will make useful and noble workers in the cause, if they can get the proper training. No better use could be found for some of the money that many of our people use aimlessly every year, than helping such worthy young men and women to become an honor and credit to our glorious cause.

2. Membership in the association is five dollars, and one dollar per year dues, or twenty-five dollars life membership, after the first fee.

The number of teachers will probably be regulated by the amount of money we have in the treasury when the board meets in the summer for final arrangements for the first school year. There will be at least three, possibly four, and the standing of those teachers must be first-class, as no one not fitted for the best academy will be employed.

It is intended to open with an academic course until such time as the college charter can be obtained (which cannot be under one year) and there is enough pledged to warrant a college course. All the branches commonly taught in any academy will be taught, and in addition Comparative Theology, Bible Studies, Psychic Development, Oratory and whatever will best fit speakers and teachers for the public platform.

Board can be had at reasonable rates in many private homes, and will be furnished in the Institute just as low as possible to serve it.

Both men and women will be admitted.

As to how long it will take to make mediums and speakers, I am not able to say, never having seen it put to a time limit. The course as outlined for the opening of the school, will be a two-years course; when it becomes a chartered college it will be a three and four years course, but mediums and speakers are like other scholars, sometimes they learn slowly and it takes longer for them to get an education. Mediumship will not be made; where it exists it will have an opportunity to develop.

Donations are coming in all of the time in moderate amounts, and promises of books for library, furnishings for the rooms, bedding and so forth. All such things will be needed and will help get the college in good running order before the September term.

Now, Spiritualists, this is something you may all be proud of; it is placing you where you belong, in the progressive rank of education, where we must be if we live. Will you take hold of this in earnest?

There is much you can do if you cannot send money; there will need be furniture for many rooms, beds and bedding, linen, carpets and all the necessary things of a home. Where there are two or three who will club together and make up a box of useful things and send to us, it can be done with little expense, and assist the work very materially.

When it is considered in its true light, I am sure every Spiritualist in this country will do what he can, if not in money, in furnishings, etc.

Send your donations of money to Moses Hull, J. C. Bump, treasurer M. P. I. A., 220 Mason street, Milwaukee, or to me, Whitewater, and send all other things to me as secretary of the M. P. I. Association. I will receive and receipt for them. Will you not respond at once?

CLARA L. STEWART,
Secretary M. P. I. A.

Moses Hull Interviewed.

While lecturing at Wheeling, West Virginia, Mr. Hull was interviewed, and responded as follows.

When questioned as to the extent and nature of his work Mr. Hull said:

"I began my public career as an exhorter in the Methodist church before I was seventeen years old. I soon fell out with the then Methodist doctrine of a literal and never ending hell of fire and brimstone. From that I went into Adventism, where I preached and debated for eleven years. After that, being naturally of an investigating turn of mind, I was attracted to Spiritualism, and after a thorough investigation of its philosophy and phenomena I took hold of that. Here I have remained for nearly forty years.

"The National Spiritualists' Association has made me its champion in all controversies, whether by tongue or pen. The result is that I have had first and last over two hundred debates. My Spiritualism is of the religious kind. I have no sympathy with that kind of stuff calling itself Spiritualism, which lives by denouncing other denominations. Living on the faults of others is indeed poor diet.

"As for the Bible, it is not a book, but a literature—it is a combination of sixty-six different tracts, written by some forty-five or more different authors, in different ages and nations of the world. The Catholic Bible has fourteen more books than ours. Some of them are quite as good as some of ours. I do not believe that God created any nation to abandon it. All the great nations and all the ages have had their Bibles, and their teachers adapted to the times. I claim that no Bible is or ever can be inspired—that God cannot inspire a book. He can inspire or breathe into men, women and children and the men, women and children thus inspired can write books. The book may all be the result of more or less inspiration, but the books themselves can by no means be inspired."

When asked about the inspiration of children, Mr. Hull remarked:

"Let us refer to the case of the child Samuel and to that little girl, Joan of Arc, who as an inspired child, as a soldier, as a general, saved France after all her statesmen, diplomats and generals had failed. Victor Hugo, that grand old Spiritualist, said of that girl: 'She was the only person in the world who ever had absolute control of a nation's army at the age of eighteen years and the only general who never made a mistake.' I am the author of over thirty books, three of which have over 500 pages each, others are smaller. My wife, Mrs. Mattie E. Hull, has written two volumes of poems and a song book, which has a circulation of over thirty thousand among the Spiritualists."

MISSIONARY.

A Call to Minnesota Spiritualists.

Having been working through the southern part of the State for some time, I am now desirous of reaching the friends in the northern sections, and with that end in view, am arranging for an extensive trip in that direction, to take place immediately after our mass meeting at St. Paul in February.

I would like to hear from every society and locality in the northern and western portion of the State that would like meetings.

So far the work is encouraging, and the interest increasing. Let us keep it thus by making an effort in the interest of our cause.

The missionary letters sent throughout the State will give an idea of what we would like to do.

Let me hear from every Spiritualist in Minnesota, that we may add to the interest everywhere. Every section will be visited if so desired, and you have but to give us your co-operation to find that we are ready and willing to do our share toward advancing the cause.

The meetings everywhere are creating interest, as is manifested by the attendance and attention given us. Preston, Minn., so far takes the lead in point of numbers in attendance, the hall being taxed to its utmost, with fully an hundred people compelled to crowd in the aisles and stand through the entire meeting.

Such interest is worthy of attention. Let us join forces and fan that interest to a living flame. I have a number of places scheduled for the northern trip, but want many more. Write me and let me know what you can do, how many meetings you want, etc.

In conclusion, let me say that the State Association has made arrangements with three capable workers who will act as missionaries and respond to calls.

I refer to Mrs. J. P. Whitwell, and Mrs. J. Lauer, of St. Paul and Miss Alice Wickstrom, of Minneapolis. I am personally acquainted with the two former, and by reputation with the latter, and feel sure that those who are made the recipients of their ministrations will be well pleased.

Mrs. Whitwell is a refined instrument in the hands of capable guides, who in their discourses give food to the souls and make one feel there is still much good in man.

Mrs. Lauer is a faithful and earnest worker, who presents the phenomenal side in a forceful manner. Miss Wickstrom combines in her work philosophy and phenomena, presenting each in a way to carry conviction to her hearers. I am told she is especially good in the Scandinavian language.

These workers are vouched for by the State Association and may be depended upon. Keep them busy. Letters addressed to any of us in care of the secretary, 2816 Eleventh avenue, South Minneapolis, will reach us. Those wishing my services on the northern trip can address me at my present address, 1334 Pine street, La Crosse, Wis.

WILL J. ERWOOD.

Wisconsin State Spiritualist Convention.

The second annual convention of the W. S. S. A. will convene in Milwaukee, in April, opening the 15th and continuing three days. Lincoln Hall has been secured to hold the convention in. Headquarters will be established at the Plankington Hotel. Now is a good time to think about attending. Begin now to plan so that when the time arrives nothing will interfere to prevent your attendance. Final arrangements are nearly completed, and everything possible is being done to have a successful session. Fine talent has been secured. The best speakers and test mediums that the Spiritualist ranks afford. We desire a large attendance, and hope all will make extra effort to attend, for there is much business to be transacted, and plans evolved to enlarge the work the coming year. Much interest is being evinced in the cause. Our mission work has begun to bear fruit all over the state, and calls for meetings are being made in localities where one before would not be attended.

Our Waukesha camp is booming and when it opens in August, it will prove a surprise and delight to all comers.

Again let me ask you to come to the convention in Milwaukee; come and give your best thought to the building up of the Morris Pratt Institute. Wisconsin is to be brought prominently before the world, for within its borders will be located the only Spiritualist college in the world. Let this stir the heart of every Spiritualist in the state. Come to the convention imbued with the spirit of push and generosity, and help make this educational factor a power in the land.

Notice will be given later of the different hotel rates, and all members of the association will receive the official circular.

NELLIE KINGSLEY BAKER,
Secretary W. S. S. A.
Portage, Wis.

Notes from Geo. H. Brooks.

I began my two months' engagement with the Unity Society of Milwaukee, Wis., the first Sunday in February and in spite of the severe cold night there was a good audience to greet me. I was glad to once more greet the many friends here. I have spoken in Milwaukee more than in any other one place, and have many true and dear friends who are very near to me.

Mrs. Hattie Smith is president, and fills the position with dignity and grace.

I received a letter this morning from a friend containing the sad news of the passing away from his home, Newport, Ky., Mr. Edwin Crawley. Newport has lost a valuable citizen, the Temple Society a staunch friend, and the cause of Spiritualism a worker it could ill afford to lose. I know the sympathy and love will be extended to Mrs. Sarah Charles, his daughter, as well as to his two sons, and the other two daughters, in their sad bereavement.

So they go, one by one.

I have a word to say to the Spiritualists of my own state, Illinois, and I hope it will be acted upon. I have no especial engagement for the month of April, and if I receive sufficient encouragement from the Spiritualists of the state, I will do some missionary work for them for that month. We have a good State Society, well equipped, and yet there are but few societies in the state, much to our shame. There should be many active societies in the state; in fact we should take the lead in the work. The reason why it has not done so in the past is on the account of the listlessness of our people through the state. So come, friends, wake up, and let us make a showing that will be a pride to us all. Send your letters either to my home address, 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill., or here to 641 Hackett avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., and I will make arrangements with you for the holding of meetings. Come, friends let us all pull together with a vim, and let us feel we are a power in the state.

G. H. BROOKS.

The Progressive Thinker in the East.

J. W. Kenyon, a prominent lecturer, writes from Fitchburg, Mass.: "The Progressive Thinker is becoming more and more appreciated by the New Englanders. We see it more frequently than any other Spiritual paper as we go from one society to another."

Missionary Work of Mr. and Mrs. Sprague.

Since leaving Pittsburg we visited Elyria, Ohio, where we held two meetings for this thriving little society, with good results. We met many dear friends at this place, all of whom are working faithfully to advance the cause of Spiritualism. It is a great satisfaction always after a separation to meet old friends, tried and true Spiritualists, while doing this active missionary work.

We left this society greatly encouraged, and hurried on to the Mid-Winter Convention of the Michigan State Spiritualists Association. This meeting was a glorious one. Everyone seemed filled with enthusiasm. The speakers and mediums were numerous and were at their best. A great variety of talent was present, and there were lectures, spirit messages, tests, recitations, invocations, instrumental and vocal music, prayers, one ordination, the baptism or consecration of two babes, raising funds to carry on the work by receiving collections, contributions, and donations.

In each department there was a spiritual energy manifested which created the elements of success. The audiences were large at every session. The last meeting was held Sunday evening, Feb. 9, in the large Maccabee Hall, which was packed to overflowing. The aisles were filled and every foot of standing room was taken. We were told that there were eight hundred people in the hall, side-rooms and entrance, and that hundreds of people went away who could not get into the building. An overflow meeting was called for, but no hall was available, therefore it could not be held. There was plenty of talent present to have made such a meeting a grand success. These meetings did much good for the cause. Many became greatly interested in the philosophy and phenomena presented. Old Spiritualists were enthused, and all were favorably impressed with the value of organized effort and missionary work in Spiritualism as this subject was presented by the missionaries. This meeting will be long remembered by those who had the pleasure of attending.

The Battle Creek Spiritualist society did everything to make this meeting the grand success it proved to be, and should receive the credit for the same from all Michigan Spiritualists. Let us have more such meetings.

Appeal to all Spiritualists in the Sunflower State.

The Spiritualists of Kansas assembled in Topeka, May 25-29, organized a State Spiritualist Association of Kansas and elected the following officers: President, D. W. Hull, of Norton; vice-president, Mrs. Bessie Bellman, of Howard; secretary, W. F. Bellman, of Topeka; treasurer, A. Markley, of Topeka; trustees, Mrs. Laura B. Payne, of Topeka; Mrs. E. G. Man's Aural Self.

BY CHARLES DAWBARN, OF CALIFORNIA.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN.

Limit to Spirit Communications.

We have noticed the remarkable fact, elicited in the investigations of the Society for Psychical Research, that spirits may be unconscious of the effect their thought is producing upon the physical organism of the sensitive. They do not know how, or in what manner their thought comes to the surface in earth life. They cannot, at least in some cases, tell whether they are writing or talking; or how many are using a mortal organism at the same time. There are times when there is so much confusion on the spirit side that those desiring and attempting to communicate retire hopeless of success. We will now watch the phenomena in which the sensitive takes no conscious part.

There is here no attempt at interchange of thought as in the case of Miss Whiting, and all inspired media. The medium is said to be entranced, and to have become an unconscious medium for some other intelligence. This possibility seems sufficiently attested by S. P. R. in the case of Mrs. Piper; and also in the experiments with Miss Cook by Sir William Crookes. It is therefore accepted as a possibility, without need of further proof. The appearance of such unconscious trance is the everyday experience of investigators with many media, both professional and in private life. The sitter likes to think himself alone with a spirit, and in direct friendly converse as between mortal and mortal. How far this is possible, or even probable, our present investigations are intended to examine.

Here is a mortal with two centers of intelligence, one of which has become silent, although death has not intervened. But this is also the case in deep and refreshing sleep. The organism is then being refreshed by rest from contact with other intelligences. The functions of the various organs proceed much as usual. Even the brain exhibits rhythmic pulsations. Healthy slumber is merely the twilight of vital energies. Mentality has, for the time, retired from duty. Like the schoolboy in recess, he is not held to accountability. He plays instead of works. He is not idle, but has changed the center of his activity.

In all this the entranced mortal is in a condition which has almost no resemblance to that of the sleeper. He is not resting from external contact with other intelligences. His brain, and often some other organs, is used actively as before, but not by the same directing intelligence. Hence there is no rest for the physical organism under such conditions. The mayor of the city is absent, and his place taken for the time by a stranger, who may have little care for the wellbeing of the inhabitants. There is no change the physiologist can discover, yet the Homo we knew, and perhaps loved, is not there to respond to our affection. Had he deserted his aural form as well as that of the mortal, he would no longer be Homo. His identity would be lost. That being apparently impossible, we see that he has retreated for the time being to his own inner life. In other words, there can be no entrancement of the aural selfhood, as otherwise identity would be destroyed. If that be so, we perceive that the powers of the aural form will remain unimpaired. It will continue in vibratory harmony with its fellows in the aural world. The difference between this condition and death is that the link between Homo and his mortal form is not broken; nor has the form commenced to disintegrate. But the vibrations of certain organs are so changed to adapt themselves to the visitor that the harmony between all the parts of the organism is lessened or destroyed. When we recall the fact that health is itself but harmony between all parts of the form, we perceive the danger to the sensitive. A marvelous change now appears. The old affections, and even tastes, having been vibratory expressions of inner selfhood, disappear. The loved one is unrecognized, and even repelled. The writer on one occasion witnessed with some amusement the chilling reception given to an affectionate husband who was tendering to his entranced wife his customary greeting. "You will please to remember this is not your wife," was the indignant exclamation of the spirit. Her extreme susceptibility was afterwards explained on the ground that she had never known matrimonial experience in earth life. In other words, had lived and died an old maid. Thus under entrancement the vibratory records, which we call memories, become confused. At first they are partly those of Homo, and partly those of the visitor, until at last, as the entrancement deepens, those of the spirit predominate. It is then the visitor is said to prove his identity, and it is then he gives the "tests" so eagerly sought by most Spiritualists.

We now notice that such memories are the effect of vibrations on or within the form of the sensitive which that form had never experienced before, and which, therefore, Homo could not interpret if he were present. Homo does not himself experience them now, and therefore when he returns he can have no memory of what has taken place. If we could keep Homo entranced from childhood to old age he would be but half a man. He would carry no experiences of earth life into his inner selfhood.

We are not now concerned with the physical effects to Homo of the occasional entrancements that constitute such mediumship. That such entrancements are possible is a question of fact, settled as we have seen by the evidence of scientific witnesses. But if possible we may rest assured they have occurred throughout human history. Whether entrancement be total or partial must depend upon the susceptibility of the mortal. In any and every case it means a change from normal vibration, however it may have been induced.

The student must realize that all experiences are recorded in vibration. Echo any experience and he has memory. But under entrancement that echo may be the experience of another. If Homo can seize and interpret it we have what is called "inspiration." Ideas come to writer and orator from he knows not where. However welcome, he recognizes they are not echoes of his own past; but he interprets them and the world calls him a genius, and admires his brilliant intellect. He is always in danger of being submerged by these vibrations. In proportion as they increase in intensity and power his entrancement deepens. At last the new vibrations entirely overshadow the old. Old memories become impossible, and the entrancement is now total. If there are intermissions when Homo is himself again he will be pronounced a genius, or an entranced medium, according to circumstances. If the entrancement becomes total he is pronounced insane, and so treated by ignorance and prejudice that any orderly manifestation of intelligence becomes impossible.

It is a mere question of degree between susceptibility to a new idea and total effacement of selfhood. And, as in so much else in earth life, the path of safety lies between the extremes. A new idea is always expressed by a vibration never experienced before. Its repetition becomes a memory. Its effect for good or ill on the organism will be studied by the wise physician. A new idea may be sometimes a blessing, and again may be a curse to a susceptible organism.

The reason we have dwelt at such length on the cause and consequence of entrancement is that certain phenomena seem to demand an almost total effacement of selfhood, while others require little more than a slight development of "nervousness." But all abnormal phenomena are based upon a change of vibration within the form of Homo that may be beneficial, or become destructive. And too often it seems as if the cause of this disturbance were indifferent to its effect upon his instrument.

Miss Whiting interprets, or believes she interprets the sensations which flash into her organism as vibrations induced by the thought of her old friend. So her condition may be defined as merely inspirational. She becomes conscious of thoughts and feelings that she believes are not self induced, and therefore are abnormal. There is a marked difference when we take the case of Mrs. Piper for analysis. The contact of Mrs. Piper the mortal with external intelligence has altogether ceased. She would literally represent a dead body to spirit eye, we are told, were it not for two marked differences. First, no process of disintegration has commenced; and, next, there are spots of light—patches of iridescence—within her form visible to spirit eye. With all that is dark the spirit visitor can make no contact. He must either contact with the "bright spot" or fail to touch earth life. How is he to do it? Precisely as we communicate with one another in our daily life. If I wish my intelligence to express itself through the organism of my friend I start vibrations in the air. They presently impress themselves on the organs by which he sees, hears or feels. There is no other way. Those organs are simply "bright spots" that I must hit by the induced vibration. The clairvoyant eye may see the brightness. The normal mortal probably shouts, and nature does the rest.

There is a startling difference in the effect, whether my thought hits Mrs. Piper's bright spot in her normal life, or when she is under entrancement. The difference consists in the method of interpretation. In the one case the vibration is interpreted by her own experience. In the other by the experience of somebody else. Thus sounds which express a foreign language would have no meaning, or be interpreted as gibberish by her untrained ear. Yet for another they might sparkle with intelligence, but only so far, and no further than they could be interpreted. When we watch the actual efforts at such communication by the veritable M. A. Oxon, ex-clergyman of earth life, and an accomplished teacher, whose identity is accepted by the experienced investigators, we find him bewildered by the dimness of the light. The "spots" are far from bright for him and he begs piteously for more light. That means that his thought has been vibrated almost into the dark. At the best he would not know if he were hitting hand, or eye or tongue; but, as it is, he, for the most part, does not even "hit" the form of the medium with force enough to make a vibration translatable by those present with educational experiences on a par with his own. What is so translated by a visitor may be outside all experience of the sensitive, but is rarely clear enough for comprehension by the mortal who is taking notes. In other words, until the visitor learns to "hit" certain bright spots in the organism of the sensitive with his outgoing thought, the world will continue to have a very poor opinion of the intelligence of returning spirits.

Our present analysis does not include the effect of "suggestion" either upon spirit or mortal, although it must be remembered as of woeful import to the spirit, even long after he can hit bright spots like an experienced marksman. We must, however, note that these bright spots are in direct vital connection with certain organs wielded by every mortal in his daily life. A vibration induced on one of these bright spots by spirit thought may thus induce co-action in tongue, or hand or eye. The result will be sounds and marks of which the brain of the medium takes no cognizance, and are therefore outside her memory. But all the same, the memory is there with startling clearness. If the outside intelligence has once vibrated a name or a message that flashed through the mortal form it becomes a traveled road for that spirit, and can be easily repeated, no matter what may be the interval.

We notice that Mrs. Piper, in her normal condition, shows no evidence of undue influence from other minds. She is, we are told by S. P. R., thoroughly domesticated and devoted to her family. Just an American wife and mother, of irreproachable life, like thousands of others. Yet we are well assured she is more than usually subject to suggestion.

If we watch an operator with his hypnotized subject we can presently learn a lesson in Nature's methods. We soon perceive that suggestion by intelligence is her normal process of evoking any action in the human form which is not strictly automatic. I "suggest" that I raise my hand, and it rises. I thus move my body in parts or as a whole, as the "something" within me suggests. By habit and constant practice the cause and the effect have become so nearly instantaneous that we lose all sight of the process. But it is there, all the same. The guiding intelligence, the Ego in charge, has no other means of controlling movement. But its success depends upon practice evolved into habit. When the flapping of the human ear ceased to be "suggested," the muscle, which had formerly responded to suggestion, withered, and to-day can show but a trace of its former obedience to suggestion. So my own suggestive power is limited. I must practice it if I would maintain it. It seems probable that by practice, prolonged perhaps through generations, every organ in the body might be held amenable to the wondrous power of suggestion.

It is when we seek the "suggestor" that we find ourselves in very deep water. Our quest reveals the human form as in a perpetual state of suggestibility through its various senses. It is thus warned of danger, and by suggestion it discovers necessities and even luxuries. Taste, smell, touch, sight, hearing, become warnings or attractions, founded on experience. The fire in our grate suggests both comfortable warmth and great danger. But fire has no such suggestive effect upon a child until he has been burned. An unknown berry simply suggests caution to the adult. It may or may not prove nutritious. To the child it suggests something good to eat. In a word, "suggestion," of which we are now hearing so much, is Nature's universal process by which life is maintained and preserved. It is founded on experience and perfected by practice on the part of the operator, whoever he may be, and by an ever increasing susceptibility on the part of the subject. So when we talk about, or watch the effect of "suggestion" we are merely interesting ourselves in a natural process by which energy is directed into some desired channel. Homo thus runs his own organism in earth life. He has no other means. Will power is only suggested energy directed to a desired end. But when we have learned this lesson we find another waiting us.

Homo, as we have said, has two centers of intelligence. We have just been speaking of the one centered in the mortal brain. But the other, away out in the aura, must also do its work by suggestion. It often proves its power to inreach, and make most potent suggestion to mortal mind. It must be remembered that the aural center is necessarily in perpetual contact with causes the mortal cannot sense. Wherever there is sufficient susceptibility in any mortal organism aural self is ready at all times to suggest its knowledge to mortal brain.

Herein we discover a natural "suggestor" for Homo. The result of this strictly natural and normal suggestion is generally styled "intuition." It has always been recognized as distinct from the slow process by which reason determines between one course and another. The mortal accepts the suggestion without rhyme or reason, and is usually the gainer by the result. The myriad forms in which intuition flashes its way into mortal life are all thus suggestions to Homo from his own aural self.

There is another step to this process which must also be watched and studied ere we realize what suggestion really is, and means to us all. It is Nature's supreme process of directing all the activities of life. The processes by which the atom attracts and rejects companionship are suggestions from one form to another, as well as from the inner to the outer life of each form. Man's inner life, which we have called his "aural selfhood," is thus in its turn subject to suggestion from without.

The man who tries to live even one day without being suggested would simply cease to use his senses, and become an idiot. Homo must hold himself open to suggestion, or lose his manhood. But he usually has the option of choice among the suggestions around him—a choice founded properly upon experience. Homo learns to welcome suggestion from his aural self in the form of intuition. And of course that aural self has its intuitions flashing from other intelligences on its own vibratory scale of expression. Therein is one of the elementary principles of suggestive power. Suggestion can only be wielded through vibration, and the induced vibration will always be an echo of its own. Therefore any intelligence that can suggest to Homo must be vibrating very nearly in unison with Homo's usual experience. So it seems almost certain that suggestion from intelligences belonging to the inner life, in other words, "spirits," would have very little direct effect upon Homo's mortal brain. They would first suggest to Homo's aural self, which then, normally and naturally, by the process of intuition, reaches the mortal brain, more or less effectively. Such processes thus resemble wires along which intelligence finds its way smoothly and naturally through the different grades of human life, from the highest conceivable down to mortal man. But every now and then we discover a break in the wire, across which the intelligence of suggestion, instead of running smoothly, leaps in a fierce blaze, as of an electric arc. The result is the convulsive tremors through which Mrs. Piper becomes sensitive to suggestion. This is an experience shared in greater or less degree by almost every other entranced sensitive. Much use and constant practice may lessen the gap and demand less waste of energy, but such convulsion is ever the sign of an unwonted suggestion producing an unwonted effect.

Not merely are convulsive contortions of Mrs. Piper painful to watch, but they leave the form itself in abnormal, and, as we would say, in unnatural positions. There is no real harmony between the vibrations of the suggested thoughts and those of her physical sense organs. We take this case as, in all probability, exhibiting direct contact between spirit thought and mortal form, with, as we claim, an assured result of serious harm to the mortal organism. Its harmony is destroyed. Disharmony results, and presently disease. A serious surgical operation has already told the tale. Certain of the invisible visitors have now by consent assumed control, and are proposing to make the contact between their own thought vibrations and the organs of the medium less convulsive.

In any case the direct approach of spirit thought to mortal organ demands so tremendous a vibratory change that it must always prove more or less injurious to the physical form. But Nature has provided another opening which may be so used as to become delightful, thoroughly harmonious, and beneficial to the sensitive. This becomes the lesson of the experiences of Mrs. Piper.

HUMANITARIAN WORK.

Is Being Done by the "Boosters," of Chicago.

Genuine Spiritualists and friends of humanity will be glad to note the growing hold of the spirit of humanitarianism, notwithstanding the contrary proclivities manifested by vivisectionists, whose cruel desires and heartless pleasures were set forth in a former issue of The Progressive Thinker.

While that article could but excite horror and painful reflections in the mind of every humane reader, the following, which is gathered from the Chicago Inter Ocean, will induce pleasurable thoughts and feelings, tending to the betterment of society and the spiritual upliftment of the individual reader—something wholly different from the influence of the cruelty embodied in the desires, pleasures and practices of the vivisectors.

It seems there is in Chicago an unique organization known by the name of "Boosters." To boost means to give a helping hand, to uplift, to assist, and that is the aim and practice of the Booster organization. How it is done is indicated in the Inter Ocean's account, which says that when the "Booster" club of Chicago is mentioned, the general thought of those who know nothing of the club or have only a superficial knowledge of the organization is that is is composed of a set of jolly good fellows, "rounders," in fact, and that its principal excuse for existence is that these jolly fellows may have a place in which to meet and enjoy themselves. There never was an impression formed so foreign to the actual facts, but the "Booster" club never takes the trouble to refute the mistaken notions that some people may have formed of its character, and pursues the calm and even tenor of its way, unruffled by what others may think.

One of the cardinal principles of the "Booster" club membership is to help one another along in the world. "If a man is down, we'll boost him up," say the "Boosters," with the saving qualification, "if he is worthy." Reckless and indiscriminate aid is not a part of its policy of action. A man must be morally and mentally worthy to be a brother of the "Boosters," and to have them live up to their name.

But there is no clannishness among the "Boosters," and when they see the need of giving a fellow mortal a boost, even though he may not be a member of the club, they put their shoulders under him and up he goes. "Many who get up forget they were ever down," reads one of the mottoes on the walls of the clubroom, while another says: "To help another to help himself is a splendid illustration of the divinity in humanity." And these mottoes, combined with the practice of the club, demonstrate that underlying the organization there is a deep vein of humanity and charity that stamps the club as unique in the history of social organizations.

It is because of this spirit of fellowship toward mankind that the "Booster" club is now watching with the most intense interest the outcome of one of those good actions which its members practice, both individually and collectively. One of the club's members is H. E. Brandt, who is in the painting and decorating business at 446 Lincoln avenue. A few months ago Mr. Brandt was engaged by a North Side property owner to put in order an empty flat. Being busy with other work at the time, Mr. Brandt was obliged to defer the work for awhile. One day he received word that the flat had been rented and that the owner would like to have the work attended to at once.

"You'd better go down there," said Mr. Brandt to one of his clerks the next day, "and see what is to be done."

The clerk visited the building and when he returned informed Mr. Brandt that the flat had been rented by a widow, and that she had moved in. "She wants us to have one room done at once," he further said to his employer. "She wants it for her son, whom she had brought home to die."

"Did she say that?" asked Mr. Brandt, his interest aroused.

"That's what she said," replied the clerk.

All that day while Mr. Brandt was attending to his business these words rang in his mind: "She wants it for her son, whom she has brought home to die." Here was one of the tragedies of life of which a great city is so prolific, and a sympathetic wave surged through his heart as he thought of the mother and her dying boy. The result was that when he closed his place of business that night, Mr. Brandt, instead of going home, jumped on a car and went to see the mother and her son.

He found the family poor. The son had just been removed from a North Side hospital, where he had been for some months, and his mother, a widow, had brought him home to spend his few remaining days. The son was afflicted with tuberculosis, which caused a number of ulcers on his back and limbs, and had wasted him almost to a shadow. Mrs. Osman, the mother, gave a history of his case to Mr. Brandt.

It appeared from this narrative that her son George had for five years been in the hands of the doctors, of whom sixty had in that period been called in to help him without success. Last summer a well-known practitioner on the North Side had been called in on the case, and after examining the patient he ordered the young man removed to a hospital which he conducted, for the purpose of having an operation performed. This was done, but the widow, who was a daily visitor to her son at the hospital, could not see after the lapse of six weeks that her son was any better, but thought him, on the contrary, worse. She ventured to express her doubts to the head of the hospital one day in the following remark:

"Doctor," she said, "I'm getting a little discouraged about my son. He's been here all these weeks and I can't see that he has improved a particle."

"Improved!" said the doctor in amazement. "Why, you didn't expect he was going to improve, did you?"

"Certainly I did," answered Mrs. Osman. "If I hadn't I would not have had him brought here and paid you $100 to operate on him."

"He'll never recover," answered the doctor. "His is an incurable case. He is dying now and I don't think he will live over a week."

"Then I'll take him home," said Mrs. Osman.

"You might just as well," was the doctor's reply. "He might just as well die at home as to die here."

So Mrs. Osman took her son home. "We had a little money when George was first taken ill," she said to Mr. Brandt, "but it has all gone in doctor's bills and medicines. I have another son, but what he earns is barely enough for us to live on. We have exhausted every channel and I have about lost hope."

Mr. Brandt was asked to go in and see the sick man, and he did so. He tried to cheer up the sufferer, and in a measure did so. "Come and see me again," said the patient, weakly, as Mr. Brandt was leaving. "I think you do me good."

For the remainder of that week the thought of George Osman and his devoted mother was seldom out of Mr. Brandt's mind. Sunday morning, November 24, he picked up the Inter Ocean after breakfast, and one of the first articles that his eye rested upon was an article telling of the marvelous results obtained by Dr. J. Warren Walker, of 1629 West Adams street, in the treatment and cure of tuberculois.

Mr. Brandt did not stop to read any further. Putting on his hat and coat, he at once started for the Osman home. "Here's a message from God to you!" he exclaimed to Mrs. Osman, as he entered the house. "You investigate the cases mentioned in this article, and if you find them all right have Dr. Walker come over here and see your son. He isn't going to die yet."

The next day Mr. Brandt went down to the Booster club and told several members the story of the Osman family. "I feel that this doctor the Inter Ocean tells about," he said, "is going to save that young man's life. I have been making a few inquiries and from what I can learn the Inter Ocean has been strictly accurate. The family is at the end of its resources. Will you gentlemen chip in and help to pay the doctor's bills if he says he can cure the young man?"

The gentlemen said they would. To Mr. Brandt's suggestion that the case was likely to be a long and expensive one to treat, they replied by saying he could draw on them for anything between $500 and $1,000. When Dr. Walker examined the patient he said to the mother:

"I can cure the tubercular affection and heal the old ulcers, but I cannot replace what has been destroyed by the surgeon's knife. The cure will take time, however, as the disease has obtained a strong lodgment in his system. It will be a matter of some months before he is cured, and he will require my daily attention for some time. If you can move over to the West Side, so that he will be convenient for me, I will undertake his case."

The Osmans accordingly moved over to 829 Walnut street, and here, December 6, the doctor began his treatment. Every week Mr. Brandt settles the bills out of the funds his fellow Boosters have placed in his hands for that purpose. He also keeps track of the progress of the patient toward health, and reports. In view of what the other doctors had said of the young man's condition, these reports appear miraculous to the Boosters. A marked change for the better is already observable in the patient.

"If the doctor can restore young Osman to health," said one of the "Boosters," "I'll guarantee that members of this club will provide him practically unlimited funds for the erection of the sanitarium he proposes to establish for tuberculosis patients."

As for Mrs. Osman, mother of the sick boy, she is one of the happiest women in Chicago. "The change in George is something surprising," she says. "He is doing finely, and it won't be long until we have him out of bed. He hasn't had to dose himself with nauseous drugs, either. The only remedies that he has had have been the subcutaneous injections and the inhalations that compose the doctor's method of treatment."

The Osman case is not the only one of a similar nature of which the "Booster" club of Chicago is guilty. There are at least a dozen men in it who are individually defraying all the medical and hospital bills of anywhere from one to three or four persons. These good Samaritans never talk about their kind actions, but the stories leak out, nevertheless. J. K. Sebree, the well-known hotel man, for instance, always has three or four cases in Chicago hospitals, and settles all the bills. George Williams, the restaurant man and former West Side political leader, is another. He has at the present time two cases for which he is defraying all expenses. One of them is a tuberculosis patient, and therefore Mr. Williams has a more than usual interest in the outcome of the Osman case.

The membership of the "Booster" club is composed of young business and professional men, and practically every line of effort in Chicago is represented in it. On its stationary the objects of the club are stated as follows: "The discouragement of unkind criticism; to push and uphold worthy fellow men; to encourage everything public-spirited, praiseworthy, and laudable." And the "Booster" club tries to live up to this profession. When the Grand Army of the Republic held its encampment in this city a year or so ago the "Booster" membership, learning that cots were needed in order that many of the veterans might have a bed to sleep on at night, presented the local entertainment committee with $2,100 for their purchase. When the Galveston flood wiped out so many thousand lives and left other thousands destitute, the "Booster" fellows were one of the first Chicago organizations to extend a helping hand. Two days after the news of the disaster had reached Chicago they wired $1,100 to Galveston.

In its life of three years the club has probably attained more celebrity throughout the United States than any other social organization. A dozen similar organizations have been started in other cities. The club has handsome quarters at 164 Madison street, and its limit of membership has been reached ever since the start. There are two features about the club that are so odd that they are worthy of mention. One is that no member may treat another, and the other is that there is not a saloon-keeper on its roster of members.

The officers of the club are John A. Heusner, president; George H. Williams, vice-president; James S. Keller, secretary, and William H. Bender, treasurer. In addition to these the board of directors comprises H. A. Cherrier, of the Great Northern Railway; John R. Thompson, the restaurant man; Warren Keeler, of the Michigan Central Railroad; Alderman A. J. Olson, W. P. Mussey, and C. E. Waters. Among its prominent members are Fred Gansbergen, former president of the Lincoln Park Board; J. K. Sebree, the hotel man; Charles S. Graves, Dr. T. J. Robeson, E. L. Wedeles, the wholesale grocer; W. A. Coleman, the real estate man, and Thomas Carmichael. John A. Heusner, the president of the club, is the president of the baking company which bears his name.

Mrs. Esther Gideon Thomas Surprised.

On New Year's Eve the pupils of Mrs. Esther Gideon Thomas' winter classes united in a very successful effort to surprise their esteemed teacher. They gathered, twenty-two in number, and entering, took possession of her home. She was for the moment speechless, but being in the minority, gracefully submitted to the inevitable. During the evening one of the members told Mrs. Thomas the object of the meeting. Appreciating her untiring efforts in leading her pupils into the broad sunlight of spiritual thought, and wishing to be kept in her remembrance, ere breaking the ties that had united them so closely for the past months, they had united in securing for her an incense burner; but the rush incidental to the holiday season had caused their gift to be delayed. As there is no loss however great, without some gain, they promised themselves another enjoyable evening when the gift should arrive. Dainty refreshments were served by the ladies, and shortly before the midnight hour which was to usher in not only a new day, but a new year, we grew quiet for the soul-communion with our loved ones who have answered the Father's call. At the first sound of the bell telling the hour, we arose, hand in hand, and repeated as with one voice, "A Happy New Year." And the vibration sent up was one that will long be remembered by all. One of our sisters heard the music from the loved ones just beyond the veil, and told us who felt it but heard it not, that it surpassed description. After several inspiriting messages we closed, returning to our homes, feeling that the links of the chain of love were strengthened for all time.

On January 9, Mrs. Thomas, not wishing to be outdone by her pupils, invited all who had participated in the previous surprise to spend the evening with them. We gladly consented and on entering found the parlors handsomely decorated and a number of mutual friends waiting to greet us. The air was full of mystery, which was solved later when Mrs. Male Way (a member of the class) stood beneath the arch with Mr. George Woods, and her friend and teacher, Mrs. Thomas, united them in marriage. Mrs. Lena Gifford gave a very beautiful inspirational poem; after which Mrs. Hathaway in a few well chosen words, presented the censer, to which Mrs. Thomas responded feelingly.

After the presentation and response, each person dropped a speck of incense on the fire with a word, all of which were gathered as pearls and woven into a beautiful poem by Mrs. Thomas. Words fail to describe the beauty of the thoughts.

Refreshments were next in order, to which all did full justice; and after some time spent in a mutual interchange of thought all present were grouped for a flashlight picture.

I have tried to tell you of the material pleasures of the two evenings, but what shall I say of the spiritual, which after all are the only lasting ones? To one who has sought for years to find the spiritual truths that would satisfy her soul, how elevating and inspiring to listen to the words of wisdom given to us through the mediums present. How sweetly solemn, too, the beautiful marriage service of one who joined our class weary and discouraged, and who has been grandly benefited through her earnestness. And what hope for him whose first introduction to our beautiful philosophy was his union with his chosen one.

And so, ere closing, we would say: Hold aloft the banner of truth; let the good work go on; and may the work of our beloved teacher and of each one of her pupils be crowned with blessing and success.

Grand Union Meeting in Cleveland, Ohio.

Pursuant to an invitation issued by Thos. Lees, the officers of the various Spiritualist societies met at his residence on First avenue, to formulate plans for a grand union meeting to take place on the 30th of March, 1902. The utmost harmony prevailed, and suitable committees were appointed to attend to all the details. Particulars will be given later.

One of the finest and largest halls in the city has been secured, with a large kitchen and dining-room. Lunch will be served by the ladies of the Temple Fund Society, and friends from the nearby towns can rest assured that there will be room for them to eat their lunch in.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, as our speakers and mediums will be those who rank high in our list of workers. All factional differences must be buried for that day at least. Let us prove our faith by our works. A small admission fee will be charged, as it is necessary to have money for actual expenses.

On Friday evening, January 31, the following mediums gave the Temple Fund Society a benefit. The first medium and speaker was C. H. Figuers, who gave a short and earnest talk on the duties of Spiritualists, followed by many convincing tests. Then came Mr. John Randall Sunderland, with a typewriter seance. All of the messages were recognized, and among the messages was a beautifully executed picture of a lady, which was recognized by a lady present as that of her niece. Afterwards "Twany," Mrs. Kemp's control, and "Lily," Mrs. Effie Moss' control, took possession of their mediums and gave many loving messages from the arisen ones. Quite a nice little sum was taken in at the door.

Sunday, Feb. 2, the mediums of Cleveland gave a benefit for the mediums' home at Reed City, Mich., and the neat little sum of $20 was raised and which has been sent to Mrs. Longley. There was a good crowd present, and many skeptics were there, some of whom received convincing proofs of continuity of life. The day was a terror—high winds and drifting snow made street-car travel very disagreeable; but the meeting was a success in every way.

In April next the mediums are going to hold another meeting for the benefit of the mediums' home at Reed City. A movement has been started among the ladies to gather bed linen, table cloths, towels and napkins, etc., to send to the home. Contributions in cash will not be refused. We must make this home a success and it depends largely on the mediums to make it so.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five percent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor current generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes, and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound. Actina has never failed to cure ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advise free, and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, Free. Address New York & London Electric Association, Dep. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

At a meeting held Sunday evening, February 2, at Union Veterans' hall, by the Spiritualists of Springfield, Ohio, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Mr. Bradbury; vice-president, Mrs. Temple; treasurer, Mr. Measey; secretary, Mr. Snarrenberger. Meetings are held every Sunday evening at the above-named hall. Strangers and traveling mediums made welcome.

Mr. and Mrs. Kates closed a very interesting series of meetings at Springfield, O., Thursday, Jan. 30. The Spiritualists of the above-named city are grateful to these mediums for the great assistance they so cheerfully rendered.

Mrs. Celia Hughes, 2517 Michigan avenue, has regained her health and strength and will continue her trumpet circles Monday evenings.

Mrs. L. C. Cook writes: "I have taken The Progressive thinker ever since it was six months old, and it is my Bible now. I could not do without it."

C. W. McCoy writes from Jackson, Mich.: "We have been having some very interesting meetings the past month, conducted by Mrs. N. S. Baade, of Detroit, Mich."

E. H. Vandenburg writes from Clear Lake, Iowa: "Harrison D. Barrett, of Boston, president of the N. S. A. was at Clear Lake, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday evenings of last week. He delivered a series of lectures explaining the truths of Spiritualism. Mr. Barrett is one of the best lecturers that has ever visited our town. He was listened to with great attention by a large number of people, and created great interest in the grand truth, which he represents."

Kate E. Barr writes: "The Progressive Thinker is eagerly welcomed every Wednesday in this house. The Home Circle Sermons and reports of the Godless and Devilless Club are especially enjoyed."

During February Prof. Lockwood will lecture at Columbus, Ohio, his second month's engagement. His address is Bryden Hotel, East Town Street.

W. W. Aber writes from Stubbs, Tex.: "I still have a few open dates for camp engagements. I would also be pleased to correspond with persons desiring the services of a materializing medium, from now until June. Address me as above."

L. writes from Detroit: "The Sunday evening services of the Earnest Workers, 333 Michigan avenue, are very largely attended. Last Sunday, Dr. Theodiste LeFort, graduate of the Chicago Psychological Institute, a young lady of remarkable enthusiasm in the cause of Spiritualism and Freethought, made an eloquent address, that sent the pulses bounding and stirred up the liveliest interest and criticism. She also sang and played for her admiring audience. So well pleased were all that she was invited to speak again next Sunday evening. The Doctor holds Sunday afternoon meetings at her own hall, 88 Michigan avenue. The birthday of Thomas Paine, Jan. 29, was celebrated by admiring friends at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. D. P. Stanton, 72 Labrose street. Mrs. Rose Ferris assisted Mrs. Metcalf by giving tests at Chene Hall, Sunday evening. Mrs. Pollock met the prejudice of her accusers in court last Wednesday, and paid a fine of $10 under protest. She was charged with 'fortune telling' in giving a reading to a 'believer,' who revealed his true character later as a detective. Prof. Austin is conducting a mission at 130 Lebrosse street. The Ladies' Aid of the Earnest Workers are arranging for a fair and fish pond at an early date. The Thursday evening socials are very popular. The new society is already talking about a larger hall, in a new building, the same to be in every respect 'their own.'"

Emma M. Nutt-Moore writes from Elwood, Ind.: "The spiritual society here still continues in interest, and many are making inquiry into the truths of our most beautiful philosophy. I have been serving the society here since the close of Camp Chesterfield, speaking every Sunday. I go to Jackson, Michigan, to serve the society there for the month of February, and on my return I shall again take charge, continuing until the closing of the hall in the spring, from which place my husband and I go to Camp Chesterfield. Should be pleased to hear from any society needing a speaker and medium, either this season or the next."

Dr. R. Greer writes: "A new church, 'The Church of the Golden Rule,' has just been organized in Chicago. The following officers were elected: President, Maude Meredith; vice-president, Dr. L. H. Freedman; secretary and treasurer, Dr. R. Greer; trustees, Mrs. Lavina Slocum, Mrs. Tena S. Freedman and Prof. Victor Vogel. The avowed objects of this new church organization is to teach and practice the Golden Rule, the natural law of life, for human conduct, and promote love, and justice among human beings, in the home, in society, and in business. Lectures, too, will be given from time to time, on vital subjects, such as Spiritualism, Psychic phenomena, Heredity, Sanitation, Hygiene, Dietetics, Medical Freedom, Divine Healing, etc. The Golden Rule is the only creed, and the only worship of the Golden Rulers. Come one, come all, and join us. Time and place for public meetings will be announced in due time."

Anna L. Gillespie writes: "I have just finished a two months' engagement with the Fraternal Society of Oakland, Cal., and will work for the First Society of San Jose for the month of February. The general interest in the work here is good. The meetings are well attended and there are many social gatherings which interest the old and young. I will have a letter of some interest to your readers soon, and will tell you more of the work in the state. I have been engaged for Chesterfield Camp for the coming season, and have some other eastern work which will take me in that direction in the spring. I would be glad to engage with camps for lectures and messages during the coming season."

Henry H. Warner, lecturer and medium, will be at Holbrook, Neb., from Feb. 7, for a week or more. Correspondents will take notice. He will be in Denver later, and would like to hear from Denver parties for engagements. From Denver he will go direct to Ely, Oregon. Oregon societies will do well to write him for dates now.

Emma M. Nutt-Moore writes from Jackson, Mich.: "I arrived Saturday night amid snow flurries at Jackson. Sunday evening I commenced my labors for the society for this month. The meetings are held in a beautiful hall, with pleasant surroundings. The officers are kindly gentlemen, and give to their workers a most cordial reception. Much interest is manifested in the work here and they have several home mediums who are doing a good work. Mrs. Martha, who was to have spoken for the society this month, had the misfortune to fall and break her arm, thus compelling her to return home. We trust the lady will speedily recover and be again able to resume her work in the field. While in Jackson my address will be 113 West Wesley street, where I should be pleased to hear from the friends in the surrounding places who may need the services of a speaker and medium."

Virginie Barrett would like to hear from Spiritualists wishing her services to organize and for platform work, at reasonable terms, between Indianapolis and St. Louis, and from adjoining states; also for camps as speaker and soloist. Address her at No. 819 E. 16th street, Indianapolis, Ind.

Stella A. Keyes writes from Worcester, Mass.: "The People's Spiritualist Society had a grand meeting Sunday night. Mrs. Nettie Holt Harding was our speaker and her lecture was very fine. Her tests, too, are very good. We are to have her again in March. Mrs. Nellie S. Noyes is to be with us next Sunday, and her astrological readings are very interesting, and her lectures very fine."

Hatfield Pettibone writes: "I wish to state to my friends of Pittsburg and Allegheny City, Pa., that it will be impossible for me to return this winter, owing to ill health. I have been under treatment ever since I left Allegheny, and under the circumstances I am compelled to remain here for a time. Letters will reach me addressed to No. 2011 Pine street, St. Louis, Mo."

Wm. H. Tucker writes from Elyria, O.: "Mrs. Dr. Dudley has delivered several lectures before the Spiritual Progressive Society of this place to full houses. We never have had anyone here that aroused the interest among our members and outsiders that she has done. She can be addressed for the present, care of Sarah J. Howk, 232 Harrison street, Elyria, Ohio."

Col. R. W. Bowman writes from Pennville, Ind., that he is prepared to deliver funeral discourses anywhere in Eastern Indiana.

J. Frank Baxter has completed a very successful work in lectureship and mediumship, covering the Sundays of January, in Willimantic, Ct., and has re-arranged his dates so as to fill another month there this season, viz., April. This month, February, the first Sundays he is lecturing and demonstrating in Portland, Me., and the last Sunday he will serve in Haverhill, Mass. Any desirous of Mr. Baxter's services, can negotiate with him for dates at reasonable rates by addressing him at 8 Franklin street, Chelsea, Mass.

H. F. Holland writes: "The Progressive Thinker is, in my opinion, the best spiritual paper published. I would not do without it."

Anna E. Winsor writes from Seattle, Wash.: "Our beloved pastor, Mrs. Lilly B. Nagell, has returned to us from the far North, where she had been for eighteen months. She is drawing large crowds of the educated, deep-thinking people of the community. The society has elected a full corps of officers; also formed a Ladies' Aid Society. We are holding monthly entertainments that are very well attended, and in every way the society seems to be in a prosperous condition. Our hall is not near large enough to accommodate the people on Sunday evening, and we are very anxious to secure larger accommodations. The ante-room is packed and many go away who cannot secure even standing-room. Mrs. Nagell is truly a wonderfully gifted woman."

Miss Augusta Johnson, a young woman residing near Evansville, Minn., has been employed in North Dakota lately, but had to resign her position and return home last week, on account of having become subject to a sort of hypnotic fits or spells. It is said that she falls into these spells or trances as often as two or three times a day, and when under their influence, reads, sings and writes in several languages which she has never studied, and about which she knows nothing whatever when in her normal condition. Rev. Lundin has secured some specimens of her writing, and the case is proving quite a puzzle to her acquaintances.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Harry J. Moore writes under date of February 3: "I am now in Elwood, having arrived this afternoon. I go to Alexandria this evening to lecture there to-morrow. I delivered an oration over the body of a child last Saturday afternoon."

E. A. Wright writes from Dresden, Ontario: "I was at one time a church member. About two years ago I attended revival meetings in the Methodist church; the evangelist was Miss Morten. She got me excited and hypnotized. I got under 'power,' and felt as though I was in heaven. I was made to do things I would not do now. I am convinced I was hypnotized. Even now if I go to church the singing, music and old hymns will very nearly bring me back. It seems that if I go to church I cannot think properly on any subject. I now think for myself, and do not ask preachers to think for me."

Writing of the custom of killing the wren, William Harrison says: "It is kept up on St. Stephen's day chiefly by boys, who at early dawn sally out armed with long sticks, beating the bushes until they find one of these birds, when they commence the chase with great shoutings, following it from bush to bush, and when killed it is suspended in a garland of ribbons, flowers and evergreens. The procession then commences, carrying the 'king of birds,' as the Druids call it, from house to house, soliciting contributions and giving a feather for luck. These are considered an effectual preservation from shipwreck and also against witchcraft."

Fay Thorn writes from Los Angeles, about sending his brother-in-law the seven premium books and The Progressive Thinker; "My brother-in-law, S. E. Brees, was a hard-shell Baptist. I had sent him a paper occasionally, and late in the fall of 1900, in writing to my sister, I said; 'Tell Sol if he will accept The Progressive Thinker and the seven books, I will send them to him.' Crops had been bad; no rain, and then too much rain. The answer came: 'Yes, Sol, says he will accept of anything.' So I had them sent to him and the fore part of last December I wrote my sister, asking how he liked them? This is what he writes, sent with my sister's letter. I thought it too good to keep. He writes as follows: 'Well, Brother Dock, I must say a few words. I thank you very much for those books and The Progressive Thinker. There is nothing like looking on both sides. Justice requires all the evidence on both sides before a verdict is rendered, and even then the verdict is sometimes wrong; but the arguments and evidence brought forth in this case looks very plausible and seem to be very convincing. I have spent nearly all my spare time since I received them, studying them from cover to cover, and investigating the subject, and I am well satisfied that there is something far deeper than mere talk. It is a subject not to be laughed at. Can it be possible that all this Protestant religion is so far from the real truth of the case? I only wish I knew, but I am perfectly willing to let it rest until I pass from this life to the life beyond. What always troubled me was, according to the teaching of our Bible nearly every family would be broken up; it was a troublesome thought, but now when I read the Bible, I find any amount of evidence that in my mind proves that Spiritualism is right. Yes, I like the paper very much, and shall continue to take it. I say again, I thank you very much.'"

G. H. Brooks writes: "I commenced my two months engagement with the Unity Society of Milwaukee, Wis., the first Sunday in this month. There was a very good attendance. I am stopping with friends, and my address will be No. 641 Hackett, avenue, where all mail and telegrams should be sent for the two months. I will respond to calls for funerals and week night meetings."

Kate E. Barr writes from Lyons Sta., Pa.: "I desire to say a few words of commendation relative to the psychic readings of Mr. G. F. Perkins, who now resides at Dimond, Almeda Co., Cal. I know that the information received through the medium of this gentleman's readings is concise—remarkably so—instructive, and replete with personal items of a very convincing nature."

Frank McKinley, the trumpet and test medium, was in Elyria, Ohio, from Feb. 13 to 17. He will be in Cleveland, at the New Amsterdam, from the 17th to the 22d. His permanent address is Sandusky, Ohio.

A correspondent writes: "G. W. Kates and wife had excellent meetings in Cincinnati, Ohio, February 2, 3 and 4. The cause in this city is very much disorganized and given over to every chance that fate wafts here. The prospects are good for an early resurrection of the Union Society and again properly presenting our cause to the public. Mr. and Mrs. Kates awakened great interest by their short visit, and also received favorable comment from the Daily Post, a local paper that seems to realize that Spiritualism is worthy of some notice. The other papers are ruled by worldly devilishness, from which they gain subsistence. We need a good leader here who can attend to the details and hold the people. A good speaker and medium would be able to develop a grand work here if such an one could reside and labor in this city for a year or more. We need active business management and an intellectual force that will command attention and protect our interests."

M. C. Campbell writes from Richmond, Ind.: "Dr. Lewis Adams and wife of Rome, New York, have located here at 908 Main street, second floor, and they offer the use of their parlors for any good lecturer or medium who will lecture for the Richmond (Ind.) public. It is the wish of the Doctor to build a temple. For the present, however, they give their home for that purpose. Will you please announce in your paper that a good materializing medium is wanted here and that he or she will find a warm welcome extended through Dr. and Mrs. Adams."

Wm. Johnson speaks favorably of the cause in Pittsburg, Pa. Mr. Day and Mr. Oles, as speaker and test mediums, have a large congregation. Mr. Hinderer and Mrs. Koch, of Anderson, Ind., are good trumpet mediums. Moses Hull is attracting large crowds.

Mrs. Dr. Gee writes from Centerville, Mich.: "We have had the great pleasure of entertaining the trumpet and trance medium, Mr. Frank McKinley and his lovely wife, for five days and nights. They have wound themselves in our hearts by their sociable and loving ways; also by bringing to us our dear ones in spirit life. We received lovely messages from our dear spirit friends."

The Oakland (Cal.) Spiritual Society, at a special meeting on Jan. 26, 1902, passed the following resolutions: "A great soul, Alfred Cridge, the eminent publicist and champion of the reform ballot known as Proportional Representation, and who has been an active Spiritualist for fifty-two years, and president of our society since its organization, passed to spirit life on the 13th of January at the ripe age of 77 years, and be it resolved, That we in our bereavement and loss add a tribute of loving words to honor his memory, for his life was one great sermon of love and strenuous work to uplift the people and teach justice and mercy, and be it resolved, That we as individuals aim to make our lives as pure in its purpose and strong in its strife to do good works and utter good words as our friend, brother and president did when he was with us in his earthly form."

Correspondent writes: "Missionaries G. W. Kates and wife report an active month during January. They held twenty-two meetings in the following places: Wheeling, W. Va.; Gallipolis, Lancaster and Springfield, Ohio. Their receipts exceeded expenses by a fair sum, considering that they took only voluntary collections at each meeting. But the opportunity to contribute to the N. S. A. support should cause larger amounts of money to result from the generous missionary work being done. The N. S. A. is placing its funds to good use, and should be well supplied. Wheeling, W. Va., has a flourishing society, well managed, with Henry Brunhaus the president, and G. W. Way, their regular speaker and medium. Success being achieved in this locality, shows what an energetic organization can do. Gallipolis and Lancaster, O., each started a local society as the result of Mr. and Mrs. Kates' visit. Springfield has been in inocuous desuetude for some time, but agreed to resurrect. They have a good contingent of Spiritualists and should be successful in conducting meetings. Dollars and enthusiasm, with an energetic leader, is all we need in every locality to insure success. Spiritualism is attracting the people and all are asking 'Why do you not have more public meetings?' And the Spiritualists ask: 'Why do we not have more members and better support?' The cause is that our local societies do not feed and help their members. They run meetings for the visitors and give 'tests' to the skeptics. Let us have meetings for psychic study and spiritual culture, and spirit messages to members—making membership worth something. Let us spend some time in self-culture and self-help. Then members will rally and remain."

Harry J. Moore lately lectured at Alexandria, Ind., to a large and appreciative audience. He would like to correspond with the secretaries of camp-meetings with a view of making engagements for camp work. He has the months of September and October open for engagements. Address him at Rochester, Ind. He writes that Mr. Jessup and Mrs. Gehring are at Rochester giving good satisfaction.

A. K. Venning writes from California: "Mr. de Voe's interesting letter in your issue of 15th January, ends with the sentence: 'God is immanent in His universe; God transcends His universe, and all the whole is God.' As a psychic student, I should like to bring to his notice that in Light of Jan. 4, some communications, said to be from Edward Maitland, through a trance medium, are given, in which the following passage occurs: Question, 'Is God immanent or transcendent, or both?' Answer: 'Both, decidedly. You can't separate the two. If you try, you make Him mortal. My conception of the divinity has altered entirely. I thought it large, but it was a speck in comparison with the truth.!'"

O. Merritt writes from Genoa, Ill.: "The Genoa people have had a grand time during the last few days at parlor meetings. We have had with us Mrs. M. A. Burland, a well-known trance speaker of Muskegon, Mich. She came to our little village about eight years ago, the first Spiritualist medium that had been in Genoa in forty years. She gave lectures here once a month for two years. At that time she lived in Chicago; then she moved to Muskegon, where she has since lived. Regardless of distance she has arranged to be with us once a year. She gives good satisfaction. 'The tree is known by its fruit,' and here is some of it. Very many have been led to investigate and are anxious to learn the truth in regard to a future state of existence. Mrs. Burland gave a public lecture at Kingston, Ill., the first meeting of the kind ever held in that place. The people were so well pleased that they insisted on an early return. She also lectured in Sycamore, Ill., where she is engaged for the second week in February, at which time she will visit Genoa again."

Mrs. M. A. Burland will visit Sycamore, Genoa and Kingston, Ill., where she will lecture and give tests. She gives excellent satisfaction wherever she goes.

Chas. A. Brown writes from Toronto, Ont.: "I want to tell you through the columns of The Progressive Thinker of a strange and beautiful experience that came to us in our little circle held at the home of Brother and Sister Clark, in this city, on Friday evening, January 31. Every member seemed to be wrought upon in a peculiar manner and a wave of old-fashioned melody ran through the whole body. Persons who never were controlled before sang sweet songs of spiritual melody, and gave inspired poetry. And the whole line of thought was unbroken, rising higher and higher in noble aspirations and eloquent language descriptive of the higher life. We have been meeting at the same place all winter, one evening in a week, and did not expect such an extensive manifestation of spirit power; it seemed to fill the place with a holy light and into this presence came a lovely spirit who laid a flower of some kind in each one of our laps—roses, lilies, sweet peas and pansies were sprinkled in profusion around us till we felt the atmosphere fragrant with flower and song. This goes far to prove to the average thinker in the ranks of Spiritualism, that we have only to create the harmonious conditions in our circles to see a universal manifestation of the great intelligences fair that rule above our mortal state, and that music is the bridge over which pure and elevating influences come to us from the other side of life."

W. H. McDonald writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "It gives me great pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of The Progressive Thinker and books, especially a Wanderer in Spirit Lands, which is far beyond my most sanguine expectations. It is the grandest of the grand, opening up a line of thought that is elevating, making its readers truer to themselves and all mankind. Too much cannot be said of it. I have only received two copies of The Progressive Thinker, but it already seems like an old friend."

W. F. Bellman writes from Topeka, Kans.: "The Brockways are now in Topeka, at 213 East 7th street. They are very comfortably located in the central part of the city and are holding special seances by appointment, also parlor seances Sundays and Thursday at 7:30 p. m. Their first seance was given Sunday evening, Feb. 2, to a large audience (considering the coldness of the weather), and was conducted in the following manner. Mr. Brockway made a few explanatory remarks, after which blank sheets of small tablet paper were distributed, and each person in the rooms was requested to write the names of two spirit friends, ask one question and then sign their names, after which each pellet was folded by the various writers and was collected by Mr. Brockway. After they were collected a small rubber band was placed around them and presented to the medium, Mrs. Brockway, to be magnetized. After she held the pellets in her hand for a short time she placed them in a small black cloth bag, and tied with a string. The bag of pellets was then handed to a skeptic in the audience, who held them during the seance. The tests were given in writing by the medium. The name of the writer was first given by the medium and the question asked was in every instance properly answered and the names of the various spirit friends were given in full. Each pellet was answered exactly and perfectly satisfactorily to all concerned. Mrs. Brockway gives private readings daily. The Brockways are widely known, having been in Topeka about five years ago. Their many friends welcome them to our city. They will remain in the city for several months, and during that time all those who are interested in Spiritualism, as well as those who doubt that their spirit friends can return and talk or communicate with them, will positively have all doubts removed after they have called on the Brockways. They are true to the cause."

Lord Chief Justice Riverstone and Justice Darling, sitting in the Court of King's Bench, London, Eng., considered a peculiar case in reference to the Jesuits in England. A short time ago a clergyman, a prominent member of the Protestant Alliance, applied to one of the metropolitan magistrates for summonses against three gentlemen for becoming Jesuits within the United Kingdom. The magistrate refused to issue the summonses and the clergyman applied through counsel for a rule from the King's Bench calling on the magistrate to show cause why he should not issue them. The clergyman's claim was based on a statute of George IV., entitled, "An Act for the Relief of Roman Catholic Subjects." The act relieved Roman Catholics from many disabilities, but one section enacted that in case any person after the commencement of the act became a Jesuit he should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. The magistrate refused the summonses on the ground that the statute was practically obsolete, and that in any case proceedings under it could be taken only at the instance of the Crown. The clergyman's counsel argued that no such doctrine should be maintained in law as that a statute could be repealed by becoming obsolete. He also maintained that there was no crime in English law for which a private person might not prosecute. The King's Bench granted the rule asked for.

Arrangements are at last concluded for the Spiritualists' Summer Camp to be held in Waukesha, Wis. Griffin's Grove having been leased for three years, with the option of buying at termination of that time. The many friends and admirers of Mrs. Clara L. Stewart will also be interested and pleased to learn that she has placed Waukesha on the favored list of desirable cities in which to hold a winter mass-meeting. Mrs. Stewart is an enthusiastic and indefatigable worker in the cause of Spiritualism, and the results show her efficiency in this line of work. In a recent interview she said: "The good people of Waukesha cannot, as yet realize the great and lasting benefits the Summer Camp will bring to their fair city. It is an element of spiritual growth and uplift, always and everywhere. It will be a grand thing for Waukesha and vicinity." As it has been owing to earnest and unceasing effort on her part that this has been brought about, the citizens of Waukesha will, it is to be hoped, extend to her a warm welcome. The exact date of the mass meeting will be decided by next week, when notice of the same will be handed to the reporters.—Waukesha Freeman.

Charles A. Kiehl writes from Williamsport, Pa.: "Mrs. E. J. Demorest finished her engagement with the First Church of Spiritualism, Williamsport, Pa.; and this society is now desirous of securing the services of a good speaker and test medium. The society is in a flourishing condition and doing good work for the cause of Spiritualism."

E. J. Bowtell will speak at Willimantic, Conn., February 23. On the evening of March 2, he will address the Theosophical Society at their rooms, Snow street, Providence, R. I. He has open dates for camp-meetings except August 17, on which date he is engaged at Niantic, Conn.

Mrs. M. H. Jamelson writes: "I received the book, 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands,' one of your elegant premiums. This makes the fifth premium I have received from you."

Mary E. Clark writes that the good work is going on finely at Elmira, N. Y.

Ben F. Hayden and wife write: "Self and wife, Mattie E., are desirous of communicating with societies in Michigan for our services during this season. We will serve societies on very reasonable terms and solicit early correspondence. Address us at No. 1431 Columbia avenue, Indianapolis, Ind."

Mrs. Charles Cork writes: "Last November I had a reading with Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley in Millwaukee, during which she made some predictions which have become verified. She knew absolutely nothing about my family affairs, as our acquaintance had been but slight, and this fact gives double weight to what she told me: She had never seen our home, yet she described it accurately; and said there was an old gentleman living with us, my husband's father, ninety-six years of age, who was to die unexpectedly before February. She also said that my son was going to take a sudden Eastern trip, which he was not contemplating. All this has come true. The old gentleman died the day before Christmas, and my son took the remains to New York for interment. A year or so ago she gave my husband a few remarkable tests at one of her hall meetings. She told him of the death of his mother and the death of his brother, and described the manner of their going out, which in both cases was in an unusual manner. It was not possible for her to know anything regarding either particular, our closest friends were ignorant on the subject. At this time she did not even know our identity."

In dealing with hypnotism, which the courts have in hand, it is essential only to remember that hypnosis is sleep, which may be very light or very deep, and that the witness who attempts to say that he was influenced to crime under hypnosis, undertakes to testify to facts that occurred during his sleep, and of which he must have been unconscious. How would a witness, who, saying nothing of hypnosis or hypnotic influence, merely undertook to tell the court and jury of what was going on while he was in an ordinary sleep? He would be silenced in a moment. The thing should not be listened to at all in a court of law. Witnesses and pretended experts should alike be hunted out of the presence of the juries, unless, indeed, the administration of the law is to be made a roaring farce, or possibly a fearful tragedy. Dreams should not be dignified into testimony, and men should not be permitted to tell their dreams to the ruin of others in the stand. To know this it does not need to be a psychologist; the subject is entirely within the powers of the intelligent lawyer. To the influence exerted upon a hypnotic person by a second party, there can be but one competent witness, namely, the second party, and even he may be mistaken in respect to the degree of influence he exerts.—Detroit Tribune.

W. A. Rozelle writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "We have succeeded in reorganizing our society with about 20 members, and the following officers, meeting at 2:30 p. m.: President, R. D. Smeaton; vice-president, Fred Hayes; secretary, W. A. Rozelle; treasurer, J. C. Hemmeter; usher Thos. Isitt; pastor, Mrs. Alice Baker; musical director, Miss Tilley Isitt. Trustees, Fred Hayes, J. C. Hemmeter, Thos. Isitt."

Dr. R. McL. Angus writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "I am serving the Superior street church, and I am meeting with a wonderful success, giving free magnetic treatments in the hall every Sunday from 1 p. m. to 2:30 p. m. After which we hold an exchange of thought and mediums' meeting from 2:30 p. m. until 5 p. m. Sunday evening services commence at 8 o'clock. Lectures and tests at No. 221 Superior street. I will be engaged until the 30th of March, after which I will be open for engagements. Address me at 200 Woodland avenue, Cleveland, Ohio."

Mrs. Sophie A. Chapman writes: "The National Sunlight Center Club held its monthly meeting Feb. 12, 8 p. m., at the home of the president, Mrs. Sarah E. Bromwell, 3310½ Rhodes avenue. A warrantee deed of 1,000 acres of land was handed her by the donor, Mr. C. A. Coughlan, for the benefit of the prospective Bromwell Institute. Meeting was adjourned for the annual election, March 12."

Dr. Geo. B. Warne writes: "The Englewood Spiritual Union of Chicago, turned over to me five dollars and thirty-seven cents, its Sunday evening collection on the 9th inst., to aid Brother Robert Grabe. He acknowledges receipt of it, saying it came when badly needed, and reports on the 13th inst., that only four of his family were then sick and their progress towards recovery was quite encouraging."

Much interest attaches to the case of James Mason, a policeman, who has been lying in a comatose condition for thirty-six hours, at Assumption, Ill. Physicians had failed to arouse him, and to-day Rev. W. H. Anderson, pastor of the Christian Church, asked to be permitted to use hypnotic suggestion. This was granted, and in a few moments he restored the patient to consciousness.

Stella A. Fisk writes: "As to the position of Spiritualism in regard to science and religion, I am very well satisfied that Spiritualism embraces everything that affects the human spirit. All matter is subject to spirit. The usefulness of matter to spirit, to the soul, is the only purpose of its existence. The different religions of the world are merely beliefs in man-created deities while Spiritualism is knowledge. Religion, science, art, economics are merely divisions or attributes. It is difficult to know what is meant by religion. We may consult Webster and still be in the dark, for each one who uses the word has his own ideal. However, it seems with all that it appeals to their conception of the divine, or their highest idea of good, for assistance in elevating the individual, and hence the race. Science on the other hand is easily defined as knowledge systemized, and this comes directly into the domain of Spiritualism and is a part of it—not the whole of it, not greater than it, but a component part. Heretofore the scope of Spiritualism has not been understood. It is so broad, so long, so deep that nothing in all the universe can escape the meshes of its all-surrounding network of truth. Pure Spiritualism is truth. They are synonymous; and truth is all-embracing."

Matthew Stephenson writes from Albany, N. Y.: "Spiritualism is very quiet here, as our society went the way of all things last fall for want of support. I am running two seances per week at my home, at 239 Park avenue, which are fairly attended. The trouble is here that the people want tests, not speaking. Indeed I find it so wherever I have been, and if there are no tests you find the interest begins to abate in that locality. Of course I suppose that would not be in line with the thoughts of some of our best speakers, especially those who have not the gift of test work, but it is a most noteworthy fact just the same."

C. B. Gruber writes: "I was ushered into mortal existence forty-one years ago, but I lived in mental darkness and under the awful tyrannical oppression of church and creed until about five years ago when The Progressive Thinker was adopted into my home and life. It caused the grandest evolution of my present life. I have all the premium books except A Wanderer in Spirit Lands, and for that I include with this order."

Dr. Geo. B. Warne writes: "I am indebted to Mrs. Laura G. Fixen, who is in attendance at the Lake Helen, Florida, Camp, for the information that it is possible to secure J. Clegg Wright to deliver in Chicago during May, a course of six lectures upon the 'Science and Philosophy of Mediumship and the Manner of Its Development.' I believe there is a goodly number of Spiritualists in this city who would gladly avail themselves of this opportunity to profit by the instructions of our ofttimes brilliant brother. Very few of us are able to go to hear him at the Cassadaga Summer Camp. The fee for the course would be one dollar. Kindly send me your name and address at 4203 Evans avenue, if you wish to be enrolled in the movement. We must be prompt, or the month named may be booked elsewhere. You can hand me in writing names and addresses during the mass-meeting, Feb. 18 and 19, but do not expect me to add to the burdens of that occasion by paying any attention to verbal enrollments."

Dr. George N. Hilligoss, of Anderson, Ind., president of the Indiana Association of Spiritualists, is spending the winter in Florida, and in letters to friends says before he returns home preparations will be made for his marriage to a widow he has met at Lake Helen, Fla. Dr. Hilligoss expresses the wish that the wedding occur in the Chesterfield camp of the Spiritualists, and that the first Sunday of the next camp-meeting be his wedding day. Dr. Hilligoss is about fifty-five years old. His first wife, who was well known on the Spiritualist platform, died about three years ago. Dr. Hilligoss and P. B. Millspaugh, of Anderson, and Henry Bronneberg, of Chesterfield, all widowers at that time, went to Florida last winter, the result of which was the marriage of Bronneberg last summer to Mrs. Perkins, of Connecticut, whom he met while in Florida. Millspaugh is in Florida again this winter, and it will not be surprising to his friends if he comes home with a bride. He is the former president of the association.—Indianapolis News.

A. W. Keller writes: "A social and test circle was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Keller, 937 W. 63d street, on Thursday evening, Feb. 13. A large number were present on the occasion, and an enjoyable evening was spent. The graphophone music before and after the test was greatly enjoyed. Sister Lincoln's Sunshine gave tests, assisted by other mediums present. Refreshments were served at the close of the gathering. It was a social treat in every way until after the hour of midnight, when the happy gathering dispersed to their own homes. There are many good mediums connected with the meetings of the Englewood Spiritual Union, and their work was appreciated that evening. The meetings of the society are held regularly every Sunday at 2:30 and 7:30 o'clock. Dr. Emma N. Warne has charge of the meetings, and her work is highly appreciated, both as speaker and test medium, and the meetings are well attended."

A. B. Child writes: "We wish to inform Spiritualists in general, and especially any missionary who happens to be coming in our direction, that the Spiritualists of Lawton, O. T., have effected a temporary organization with a membership of fifteen. Lawton is a new city, situated about 40 miles from the Texas line in that portion of Oklahoma that was opened for settlement on the 6th of last August. It has a population of from 10,000 to 12,000. Most of our states are represented here. We think there are a great many Spiritualists and liberal-minded people here, if we only had some way to bring them out. We need a good organizer and a series of open meetings where the philosophy can be expounded as well as demonstrations made of the continuity of life. As yet we have no developed medium who would feel competent to give tests from the rostrum."

J. W. Kenyon writes from Fitchburg, Mass.: "Mrs. J. W. Kenyon has filled engagements four Sundays in Fitchburg, Mass.; three in Pawtucket, R. I.; three in New Bedford and Salem, and two months in Worcester, Mass. In all these societies she has filled their halls to their utmost capacity, as the tests given are very convincing. Last Sunday in this city for an hour and a half, tests of a great variety were given. The spirit controls called the names of those to whom they came, and gave their own, going from one member of the family to another, sitting in different parts of the hall, and giving the names of members of the family not present, and sending them loving messages. The number of converts to the fact of spirit existence made by her tests is very great. They soon lose all interest in the churches to which they belong, and drop out quietly. This is causing the church to decline, and hence the complaints we see in the papers. However they do not see the true cause of their decadence. The leaders in the churches do not come in touch with the work that Spiritualism is doing, and do not know of this undercurrent that is sweeping the foundations from under them. The great mass of the people are not reached by the sciences, nor by readings, as they have but little time to read, after looking a daily paper over for general news, but seek the mediums for guidance and comfort. The rich and the poor, the minister and priest, the high and low, the learned and ignorant, are quietly and privately seeking the truth of Spiritualism through the public and private medium. Even the merchant is taking advantage of this fact to turn it to his financial advantage."

Thos. M. Locke writes from Philadelphia, Pa.: "During the month of December we had Mr. and Mrs. Elmer Carpenter, of Detroit, Mich., engaged to serve our society during the entire month, but owing to the severe illness of Mrs. Carpenter's mother, they were obliged to cancel their engagement and return to Detroit, after having served our society two weeks. During the month of January we had Mr. and Mrs. Sprague; they are earnest, good workers, and our membership was greatly increased during their engagement. Mr. Sprague while with us, had the pleasure of performing the marriage of two of our young members, Mr. William McCay and Miss Hannah Raffel. They had both joined our society two years before when Mr. Sprague was with us, and they wanted him to marry them. The ceremony was performed at Handel and Hayden hall, January 22, and it was certainly a very pretty wedding. The bride was attired in white silk and the sister acting as bridesmaid wore a lovely gown of dove-colored silk, and the youngest sister, dressed in white, was flower girl. Mr. Sprague spoke beautifully to them, and the ceremony was very impressive. January 23, Mrs. May S. Pepper, the phenomenal psychic, gave a seance in the same hall to a large audience. She is always well received in our city, and has a large circle of friends. This month we have Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn, who is a fine inspirational speaker, taking subjects for lectures and poems from the audience."

L. A. B. Gault writes: "During the past two weeks Waukesha, Wis., has been highly favored with a series of most interesting and instructing meetings, given by our president, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart. She so clearly elucidates the fact of the naturalness and reasonableness of our faith, and so ably demonstrates it in her tests, that her audiences are held throughout the entire meetings, many of them 'convinced against their will' by the messages of risen friends. Mrs. Stewart considers our city a 'field white with harvest,' for missionary work along spiritual lines, and has at length succeeded in making arrangements for regular Tuesday evening meetings with Mrs. Catherine McFarlin, of Milwaukee, as speaker. We are much pleased over this, and look for good results. We believe that when it is understood that we hold regular meetings many will be glad to come who do not hear of our occasional meetings, or who had some other engagement at that particular time. From the deep interest shown by those who were in attendance, Mrs. Stewart felt it to be advisable to establish regular meetings, which, for the present will be held at the home of Mrs. Pierce, 330 South street. Mrs. McFarlin visited our city some years ago, and much pleasure is manifested at the prospect of her return, and we feel encouraged that a deep and widespread interest will be awakened in the glorious truth that science demonstrates the hope of religion."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give what ever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Francis Jackson: Q. (1) Are there any trustworthy accounts of church history of the years 315 and 325 Christian era?

(2) Any account from spiritual sources of the origin of Christianity?

A. (1) The last chapter of Mosheim's "communications on the "state of Christianity during the first three hundred and twenty-five years from the Christian era," gives the views of Christian on this subject. The most exhaustive and impartial history of this period is found in the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, by Gibbon, commencing with the fourteenth chapter. Here that great historian has given the reign of Constantine the Great, and a critical exposition of the causes which led to the use of the Christian religion and the fall of the empire; for the new religion brought with it and was the most potent cause of the reign of ignorance and superstition of the Dark Ages.

So far as history goes, nothing can be found more impartial, and just, and for his adhesion to the truth, Gibbon has been decried as an infidel by his theological adversaries, and accused of falsifying to sustain his position. There is one thing to be regretted by the thoughtful reader of his pages. The authorities are given, church fathers and early Christian writers, and the historian is supported by constant quotations. If these authorities are reliable, his statements are invulnerable. In the searchlight of modern criticism, however, these writings of the "early fathers," and others, become of doubtful authenticity, and may have been written by pious monks, lying for "the love of Jesus," nearly a thousand years after the events they record, instead of being chroniclers of events personally witnessed. At last, what was really written in the third and fourth centuries, what was added thereto, what written by scheming sectaries, is unknown and may never be known.

Unfortunately the great historians of the Roman civilization were dead, and no pagan arose even in an attempt to fill their places. The chronicles of centuries were written by priests and monks who regarded falsehood as a virtue if employed in the furtherance of their religion. Writings, if produced at the present time would not be held by critics of the least value as historic evidence.

Even the histories purporting to have been written by pagan authors have been changed in transcribing and interpolated, until their authors would be scarcely able to recognize their works.

(2) There have been many revelations purporting to be from a spiritual source as to the origin of Christianity, as "Antiquity Unveiled," and the narrative of Jesus of Nazareth, one of the premium books offered by The Progressive Thinker. Necessarily such revelations can have no other proof of correctness, than what is called "internal evidence," and whatever reliance may be placed in their purported authorship. This may not be satisfactorily sufficient, but really is it not all we have in evidence of the truthfulness of the wholeness of the history of Christianity and of the books of the New Testament? Who can give the names of their authors, or the date of their writing? Where is any MS. among all the precious, treasured copies, older than the 12th century? Eight hundred years from an event to its preserved record is a long time. With no printing press to multiply copies, and when there was only one MS. in the world, the pious scribes erase, interpolate and change to their heart's desire and no one know of their fraud on future readers. Can we be astonished that the evidences of the one great and most astounding fact in human history are not overwhelming? Truly until many centuries afterwards—an indefinite time—these "evidences" were not written.

J. R. Armstrong: Q. Do you think with Quackenbos that talent in any given direction can be aided by suggestion?

A. There are many cases where suggestion and the self-confidence which comes of it, may be of service, but that a hypnotist can take any one and by suggestion make them famous musicians, writers, speakers, mathematicians, actors, etc., is unsupported by facts, and a false pretension. The concentration of the mind on any one subject is the best hypnotic influence, and opens the way for spirit aid, but it should be known that there is no royal road to knowledge, or to success, and the professors of hypnotism can not at best confer on their subjects more intelligence than they have themselves.

Mark Chandler: Q. Was there during the Middle Ages a "children's crusade" to the Holy Land?

A. There was, and it occurred in the year 1212, and nothing recorded in the history of the benighted ages following the downfall of the old religion, and introduction of Christianity, more vividly presents the ignorance and superstition which universally prevailed. The fervent exhortations of self-elected priests against the sin of leaving the holy sepulchre in the hands of the infidel, had aroused Europe, and the best and bravest men started on the insane expectation that God would wrest the holy place from its desecrators and give the Mohammedans over to them, bound hand and foot, for slaughter. The highway from Europe to Asia became paved with the bones of the deluded hosts who rushed to destruction.

Then came a miracle of two boy preachers in the beginning of the thirteenth century. Stephen of Cloys (France) and Nicholas of Cologne (Germany). They were scarcely twelve years old but they were seized with the madness of the times, and declared that there must be a crusade of children. They pretended to be inspired by heaven, and were readily believed by the ignorant masses. Parents were willing and anxious to have their children join the crusade, which was to go direct on foot to Palestine, not with arms, but praying and singing psalms of victory, and the prophet leaders assured them that when they reached the sea, its waves would part and let them pass over.

The German prophet gathered a following of 40,000 children, and the French 30,000. They came from higher walks of life as well as low, and scarcely any exceeded twelve years of age. In the passage of the Alps, the German army of children, ill provided for, the leaders left providing for them to God, suffered so dreadfully that 20,000 perished. Of the French 10,000 died before reaching Marseilles.

When Nicholas with the remnant of his forces arrived at Genoa, and attempted to walk into the sea, he found that it did not part for him, and the children were turned adrift. The Genoese sent many home on their ships, but others went on to Pisa where they obtained passage to the Holy Land.

Of the French children they found the sea at Marseilles equally obdurate to their prayers or commands. Some six thousand found conveyance by ships to Palestine where those who survived the hardships of the voyage, were seized by the Turks and sold into irredeemable slavery.

Prospector: Q. What is the cost of telegraph messages to points in Alaska?

A. From New York, day messages of ten words not including address, $6.50, and 41 cents for each additional word. Night messages are twenty-five cents less.

This rate is not as excessive as to some other outlying places. To Manila it is $2.35 per word, and the address is included. To the other Philippine Islands, $2.46 per word.

To Algeria it is only 32 cents per word, while to China it is $1.60.

Mrs. A. L. Starr: Q. I am sick; have been for more than a year. Before I became ill. I constantly held communication with my spirit friends, but now I receive nothing. If they could come before, why do they not come to me now when, sick and despondent, I need them most?

A. Spirit friends may be with us although we do not recognize their presence, as they find it impossible to communicate with us. By exhausting the vital forces sickness may destroy the sensitive condition which is essential. You might as well ask why is it that yesterday when the telephone instrument was in perfect order, you found it easy to converse with your friends, today when the current is cut off you utterly fail?

Instead of casting doubt on your preceding communications, failure now is evidence of their genuineness. Mediums often have periods more or less lengthy, when from some cause they lose their sensitiveness. This may result from illness too slight to be recognized, and frequently from exhaustion by too continuous use of psychic power.

Asphodel Blooms.

Again we are regaled by fresh breathings from the poetic soul of Emma Rood Tuttle. "Asphodel Blooms" are rich in spiritual ideas and beautiful sentiment. In this book great principles are illuminated in simple but chaste and forcible language. Thus arrayed in poetic symbols, truth and affection make a magic appeal to the mind, and quicken all of the most delicate and tender emotions. To read them appreciatingly is to bathe in an atmosphere of tropical incense, and inhale the elixir of life. In a single poem one may find more inspiration to nourish the moral sympathies, and sustain the spiritual nature, than a whole volume of argument and scientific logic. Such poetry is not merely a pleasing feast to the fancy; it is an intellectual treasury and moral talisman. I pity the man or woman that can find no pleasure or profit in poetry and music. James G. Clark sang more truth into the souls of men than a hundred preachers can pound and pray in in a lifetime, and his poetry carried noble sentiment and convincing argument in its rare shadings of love, emotion, aspiration and conviction. The Unseen City, by Emma Rood Tuttle, set to music by his genius, was sung into thousands of lives with impressive effect.

In "Asphodel Blooms, Mrs. Tuttle has brought the light and sweetness of many years in a single hour, and focalized the trials and triumphs, the sorrows and smiles, the sacrifices and fruitage, the wit and wisdom of her large range of being and doing upon the consciousness that illumines her "Blooms." VITAL QUESTIONS.

Its exalted phenomena may be assigned a place in the domain of spiritual science, but the results of its demonstrated power on the physical plane are no more sacred than the law of gravitation, which makes an apple fall, water to run down hill, and again seek its level, or the intuition of the honey bee, which, with its unique proboscis extracts the nectar of life from the tiny fountains of a clover blossom. The achievements of Edison and Tesla, on the plane of material science, should be classed with its limited forces, or as feeble rays of intelligence, since the eulogies of enthusiasts hold the mind to physical planes, unfitting the masses for the acceptance of more marked unfoldments which will come with the great wave of Intellect Freedom just laving the mist-enshrouded shores of old Mortality!

Third, the attempt to make a religion of Spiritualism would prove an egregious mistake, and if accomplished would put the race back a thousand years in its attainment of mental and spiritual liberty. It would be impossible to make it such, only in name, since its unlimited thought-promoting agencies can never be ruled by the whimsical fiat of petty man. Spiritual societies should therefore be organized in accordance with the dictates of inherent laws written plainly in the open book of Nature, minus singing of orthodox hymns and the prayer maneuver—in fact, stepping clear of the religious harness, casting off the shackles that bind to ancient ruts, ignoring the gilt-edged titles that that enamor and ensnare, and thus ascend to the foothills that border the uplands of the true spiritual philosophy.

And, again, don't seek to be regarded as "ministers" of a "religion" for the sake of obtaining half-fare on railways. Don't ape the churches. Be wise! Be good! Be free! But remember above all else, that "religion" is not necessarily goodness, nor any part of it; neither is goodness a "religion." Moral principle is the wheat struggling in the great field of sentient life; religion, and its resultant influences, on this plane, are the tares which often overshadow, through worldly powers the golden grain of spiritual truth.

Fourth, I regard spirit communion also as a fact in Nature. Its demonstrated results on the physical plane, whether good or evil, cannot, if we adhere to reason, be made the basis of a religious cult, and properly belong to the domain of physical or spiritual science, in accordance with their exalted quality or force.

Fifth, you repeat with much truth that Spiritualism cannot be "patented or copyrighted," even though the Catholic, Chinese and Mormon spirits join hands to make it a tall to fly their creedish kite. I am radically inclined to the view that the communication between mortals and spirits should be classed under the head of natural law, and in fact, as you say we "cannot get out of its domain," therefore, from an individual standpoint I believe it impossible to engraft the eternal principles of genuine Spiritualism into the gnarled, blighted tree of religion and have any show of progressive growth.

BURR CHAAPEL.

Waverly, N. Y.

It Is More than Science, Less than Religion.

Spiritualism is scientific, but it is more than a science. Spirit return is religious, but it is less than religion. We teach philosophy—spirits teach philosophy, but both of us teach more than philosophy. Spiritualism is a fact, and a continuation of this life. Now, what is this life? What are we? We should organize. But that organization should not make a cult—a creed—a church—a priesthood. The human soul is the only guide and authority. The educated reason is the best representative of deity. Nature is truth. I have no right to dictate to you in belief; and you have no right to force your opinion upon me.

This seems dogmatic, perhaps, but to me it seems axiomatic. If a candid examination shows a mistake, I wish to correct it. Early educated ideas, and conceit also must be eliminated. We have had enough bibles and inquisitions. We have also seen too much light for stubborn material science to autocratically reject anything it cannot weigh. The finer elements are the more potent in life.

We all believe in and recommend Progressive Lyceums. They are organized societies, but they bind and dictate no one's conscience. Their work is to please, attract aid, develop, educate, unfold, unite, build up character, etc. It is in every way scientific, philosophical and religious. What more is needed for older persons, save additional topics, methods and time?

The teaching of immorality should not be thrust upon the meetings. When free love came upon us, I got down from the omnibus and went into the woods. I wanted no cure worse than the disease. I staid in the woods many years. Now we have come to the parting of two roads. Shall we part, is the question. It is a question of belief and disbelief; the old theme on which men have cut each other's throats for thousands of years. It has nothing to do with religion. Religion is the practice of goodness; all that is human and right.

I understand the metal of Spiritualists. Most of us on all sides, think they can explain the problem of Deity. We can do no such thing. You may work at it as much and when you please, if you will do it intelligently and kindly.

The world cannot be held still. Organize with a strong creed, and you will change it directly. The old is breaking down. Are we to take their place? If we are, refuse to imitate their follies—take their good points—espouse the cause of justice in all its relations.

We have got to convert the world to good thought and action. Not only that but we have got to do the same with the spirit world. We need all the help we can get. The other world and this must unite. Not only Spiritualists, but infidels and churchmen must join to rear a higher manhood.

We are brethren and must not allow hate, prejudice or unfriendliness to build barriers between us. Produce good goods and keep on in spite of abuse.

I will stop. You see my thought. If harmony cannot come without too much concession, probably two cults may come instead of one.

Life was, is and will be. Personal or impersonal, we do not know, probably the latter, because as it is omnipresent, how could it be located? The movement of this force has developed all worlds, systems and peoples; when, how and where no one knows. This life manifests according to conditions. No one knows how the species come. Let us not quarrel.

For the hope of humanity, I remain,

THE FLOWER

Of All Religions, Is Spiritualism.

Religion is the soul's recognition of its own immortality, also of worlds of life, and activity invisible to the mortal eye.

The fact that man is a spiritual being dwelling, even whilst in the body, in the spirit world, it is not strange that he should have an inherent knowledge of things not cognized by the mortal senses. There is a sense, the surest of the sure, the most delicate, refined, and accurate, I mean the soul sense commonly called intuition.

Through this means man obtains knowledge of the spiritual domain as through the mortal senses he acquires knowledge of material things.

Upon this fact has been founded every religion of every age.

If those religions have been what seem to us foolish, and their forms and ceremonials crude or absurd, it was because our ancestors had not reached a plane of intellectual development which would enable them to do better.

Why did man first navigate the river with a log raft? Why did he not make a steamboat the first thing? He made the log raft because that was the best he could do. He did not make the steamboat, because he did not know how.

The rivers awaited navigation, all the materials for the construction of boats were at hand, but man must gradually grow to where he could intelligently give expression to the ideas on navigation which struggled up in his mind and clamored for recognition.

If there had been no possibility of navigation he never would have had a thought in that direction.

And if there were no beyond, no place where those who leave us go to live on and on, if man were just a mortal being having no relation with any world but this, he would never had an idea of such a thing, and there never would have been a religion.

The code of ethics connected with every religion is based upon the fact that living in harmony with great moral law will give happiness and vice versa.

Since man's religion appeals to the highest emotions of the soul, in fact is the real man's efforts to grasp and realize his unlimited powers and possibilities, to pierce the veil of the future and sometimes try to look into the past as well, I see no reason why Spiritualism should not be called a religion.

In my opinion it is the bright consummate flower of all religions. It is the religion which corresponds to man's present intellectual development. It is the religion which has added to faith knowledge, and demonstrated to the mortal sense a part, at least, of what the soul has so long known to be true. It is the religion born in that wonderful 19th century which has taken such a long stride away from the mental condition which could invent nothing better than an ox cart, a log raft, or new patterns for stone or wooden gods.

All religions have had as a part of their creeds the belief in a future life, a place where the good would be happy and the bad would be miserable, and either a hand-made or mind-made deity who could hear and answer their prayers.

Spiritualism is an improvement over its ancestral religions, even its latest progenitor, Protestantism, for instead of a place where just a few blood-washed ones will be saved, Spiritualism declares that it is possible for all to rise to a condition of happiness, outgrowing every defect and becoming perfect souls.

In place of a lake of fire and brimstone, we are taught that a condition of unrest and unhappiness attends the evil doer and will until he outgrows it by right living and right thinking, whether in this world or the hereafter.

Believing that the day of monarchies is about over, we have relegated to the past that one wherein Jehovah so long reigned supreme, and set up in its stead the grand universal republic, inaugurating as its ruler the Infinite Spirit of Love.

Religionists of the past believed that their God could hear and answer their prayers, but Spiritualists, at least some of them, believe that through the soul's aspirations we come into better accord with the universal life current, and en rapport with the things needful for our further unfoldment. And that in answer of prayer or in any phenomenon there is nothing miraculous in the general sense, but that all is under the control of natural law.

Many other comparisons might be made regarding the ethics, etc., of Spiritualism, showing its similarity to other religions, but I fear I have already gone beyond the space allotted me.

The Young Should Be Instructed.

You request my views on the subject of Spiritualism being a religion or a scientific fact that can be proven to the satisfaction of all who wish to investigate. There are millions of Spiritualists in this country and in Europe that have been converted to its truths through its phenomena, and are so well pleased with it that they feel like praising God for having brought to them the return of their loved ones that had passed out of their sight as they supposed forever. Let all such people make a religion of it, if they choose to do so, for it makes them happy. To theorize in a religious way calls about us from the spirit world a class of disappointed spirits that have never seen God or even Jesus. All such that come to earth go away satisfied that the religion of the old theology is untrue, hence they commence to investigate Spiritualism and learn of its holy truths.

Spiritualism would not be worth much to me if it could not be demonstrated through scientific principles. Science is a clincher that overshadows all theories, and brings home to us the wonderful truth that man is immortal and lives forever.

There is a law in nature that should be taught in our schools. The young in all classes in society should be instructed how to proceed in order to bring about conditions that will call to their side their loved ones, that are always desirous to make themselves known to their friends on earth. This grand truth of spirit return is kept in the background by the clergy, who are suspicious that it would destroy their influence with the people. The truths of Modern Spiritualism should be taught in our common schools, so that when our children grow up they would start in life with the knowledge that they were immortal beings.

The attraction has become of so much importance of late years that the two worlds are blending into one another to that degree that the thought of each other can be read with little difficulty even though they are a long distance apart. In harmony there is much to be gained; to instruct the young in these truths will become a science of much importance; let it be taught in our schools. The possibilities of Spiritualism are becoming more and more instructive as time advances, therefore we may expect greater success of its powers as time unfolds its many resources. To teach it we should proclaim it a science of great importance to the young to learn.

It is successful as a religion. It is potent as a science, and is making great headway in both directions. By all means let the young be instructed in its scientific advantages.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

It Has Its Rise in Certain Feelings.

The first question here to determine is, What is religion? It is a feeling that belongs to the individual in regard to his relation to a Supreme Being (as he conceives) and a concern for the welfare of his soul after death. It has its use in faith, and is as applicable to one kind of faith as to another. Since faiths differ, religions differ; and being different, they involve different interests, in consequence of which is conflict resulting in a chaos of opinion, confusion and strife. Religion is purely selfish; it cannot apply to public welfare.

It demands the worship of some superior being. Since that being is the subject of various conceptions, the modes of worship must be different. To a rational mind, worship can be acceptable to a being of infinite power, infinite wisdom and infinite love. Even to the most superior finite being, worship would be repugnant. It is adoration, praise, adulation which, in its final analysis, is a species of flattery which is a human feeling. It implies a desire on the part of the object worshiped to be exalted, magnified, glorified, adored—a feeling that would be odious to an honorable man, much more so to an infinite God. A God that demands worship is unworthy of decent respect; and if denied him, he would be unhappy.

Religion is founded on faith. It has its rise in certain feelings. It is a matter of individual concern. As a system, it has no basis on fact; its assumptions are without foundation; its very nature and origin are human, and its purpose is human aggrandizement—the few at the expense of the many. No proof or demonstration is claimed for it, even by the theologians themselves. It is only "I believe; Lord, help my unbelief."

The history of religion shows its effects on civilization—its bloody wars, its cruel despotism, its martyrdom, its inquisition and boundless ambition of the priesthood; its degrading superstition, warping and distorting the mind and enslaving the soul.

No man or class of men has a right to dictate how another shall feel, nor take advantage of another's fears, or ignorance.

When religion is reduced to a system and its leaders assume authority in the name of God, threatening his vengeance on non-conformers to the demands of the priesthood whose assumptions are accepted as indisputable truth, it is a dire misfortune to the world. The claim of the priesthood as intermediator between God and man is the motive power of all religions.

Were there no wealth, dignity, authority or dominion in religion, there would be no souls to save. Religion declares: "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin."

Much has been said about the "religion" of Jesus. He established no religious worship, he was an iconoclast; he observed no set days; prescribed no rites or ceremonies; taught no creed. He never used the word "religion" so far as we know. In all his teaching, he always kept within the bounds of pure ethics.

Spiritualism is founded on demonstrable truth. Truth belongs alike to all. It is impersonal. To prescribe the bounds and limits of truth, to relegate it to the category of faiths and creeds, is an unwarranted assumption of authority, and to subject it to the tender mercies of priestcraft, would be a calamity. The monopolization of truth in the interests of any class is and ever has been the curse of humanity.

Let Spiritualists see to it, that the sublime truth of immortality and communion with the loved ones gone before, shall be free and untrammeled by the interposition of any authority.

The facts upon which Spiritualism is founded are so clear, palpable and demonstrable as are those of mechanics and chemistry, its scientific basis is as firm and solid. Its facts and principles constitute the elements of science the same as do those of physical science. Truth only, serves mankind; it is free to all; but to make it serviceable, it must be formulated and applied to life's uses. There is no truth more beneficial to the world than Spiritualism. It would be as unjust and unreasonable to appropriate it in the interest of any one class, as it would be to appropriate the truth and principles of mechanics or chemistry in the interest of any one class.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

Present Mission of Spiritualism.

Spiritualism has a mission unique in the world's history. It fills a place in this age distinctly its own, and from which it was debarred in the past. Its present mission is to complete the science of the universe that was laid in material evolution about the time of the beginning of its phenomena. These two departments of science have kept pace with each other up to the present as complementaries. They stand related as body and spirit, and their developments are mutually dependent as the material and occult sides of nature. The material must precede the occult in time, else the occult, having no material scientific base, falls under the ban of superstition and ignorance, which it did in the past in meeting social condemnation and legal persecution.

It is a singular fact that the great lights of material and occult science arose about the same time, and Spiritualism took up the broken ladder, left by Humboldt and Darwin and raised it to the ethereal domain of nature. Spiritualism rolled the stone from the tomb and revealed the angel surviving the corporeal. Material science has never rent the veil of the occult, and given man his immortal heritage, but consigned him to the silent and unknown. The argument and conclusion drawn from the above facts, show the mission of Spiritualism to be unmistakable scientific.

All science rests upon immutable law, which is its stability. Occult science in all phases of phenomena rest upon immutable law of conditions, as much so as at any fact of physical science. Spiritualism, as the only demonstration of occult science, depends upon no moral, intellectual, or racial qualities as communicative conditions, but upon the law of forces.

Spiritualism, at its present stage, is a science builder. It is born of the spirit world, and should not be engrafted upon any existing religion. The future mission of Spiritualism may be to establish a scientific religion of spirituality, based on law and fact, but its present status cannot assume this feature without doing violence to its mission and uses. It is still a child in occult science and can not assume its matured destiny of a spiritual religion.

While Spiritualism holds the only keys to the occult world, the portals of devotion cannot be entered before the great temple itself is completed, and this cannot be before material and occult science become one in fact and law. Then the door of nature's universal temple will be opened with the key of knowledge, and devotion can enter in. Until then let Spiritualism abide in her mission and not attempt to take the church kingdom by storm, as the N. S. A., in her plan of religious activity, is foreshadowing.

In ages to come when Spiritualism has reared her great temple of Spirituality, based upon universal law, then her stones will never crumble, nor her glittering splendor tarnish, for its inscription will be, "Man, the immortal child of nature, and nature, the child of God."

Man has three births: that of the corporeal, spirit and angel, one growing out of the other. He has passed the corporeal birth of church unity and entered the spirit birth of Spiritualism, and when the stage of the spirit age is finished Spiritualism will conduct man into the glorious science of angelhood and give the world a universal religion of Spirituality. Until then let not Spiritualism buy Esau's birth-right of churchianity. W. A. JONES.

THE OLD QUESTION.

Is Spiritualism a Science, or a Religion.

Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?

The above question is asked of the undersigned by the ever enterprising editor of The Progressive Thinker, a publication which is far from being misnamed.

Briefly stated, it is the old question over again: "Is Spiritualism a science, or a religion?"

My understanding of the word Spiritualism is that it is a term applied to a group of facts which are now becoming more and more generally acknowledged to be facts. My understanding of the term facts is that it is one applied to established truths in any department of research or investigation and that all facts or truths are scientific inasmuch as science is the knowledge of facts. As astronomy is a term applied to a group of well ascertained facts pertaining to the sun, moon and stars, so Spiritualism is a term applied to a group of well-ascertained facts pertaining to the possibility of the embodied communicating with the disembodied, however imperfectly such communication is yet consummated. That the premises on which Spiritualism is based are facts is acknowledged even by scientists who give them a different interpretation or who oppose their Spiritualistic explanation. Vide Hudson's "Law of Psychic Phenomena," page 206.

To the extent that the Christian religion or any religion is based upon well ascertained facts capable of demonstration, to that extent such religion is scientific in character and "knoweth" rather than "believeth."

The basic facts which constitute the Gibraltar of Spiritualism are essentially scientific in character but out of and from them there springeth up in the human heart an emotion, a sentiment, a hope, an assurance, certain dictates of conscience which are related to the hereafter and to the unseen world of spirits to which we are all hastening, which are religious in nature.

The sun, moon and stars, the thunder and lightning, the rainbow and the boundless ocean are all every-day scientific facts, but they inspire within us a sense of awe, grandeur and sublimity that is not of this earth, creating the intensest desire in our hearts to know something of their First Great Cause and our relations to him. I am at a loss therefore to know how we are to separate the science of Spiritualism from the religion or the glory of Spiritualism.

Connected with Spiritualism as with all other religions there will doubtless ever be much that is purely speculative.

Nor would I have it otherwise. Every newly established fact in Spiritualism gives birth to new ideas, new thought, new theories which in their turn serve finally to establish new truth and thus the machinery of evolution is kept in constant operation.

It should ever be borne in mind that there is a marked distinction between religion and theology. The religion of Spiritualism, like that of Thomas Paine, is to do good; it is humanitarian in character, recognizing the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. No man can be a true Spiritualist without manifesting this kind of religion.

But Spiritualism has very little if any confidence in the dogmatic theology contained in that ecclesiastical document known as "The Apostles' Creed" although it is now generally accepted as a fact, I believe, that the apostles had nothing to do with it. If a line were drawn through each sentence of that creed that is now repudiated even by Christians whose lips repeat it every Sunday, it would present a sorry spectacle. But, disfigured as it is, it is still in the ring. Probably after the Presbyterians get through revising their creed, the "Apostles" (?) will receive some attention. The world moves and theology is evoluting. Very few old time Christians believe theologically, as they did twenty-five or thirty years ago, the eyes of the world are now turned toward the star of Spiritualism and the natural religion which naturally springs from it.

H. V. SWERINGEN.

RELIGION OR SCIENCE?

The Great Lesson of Brotherhood.

This question reminds one of the subjects for discussion by the debating society in the long ago, when all had the same wisdom on the subject discussed, no more and no less, afterward as before; for the reason that in this case Spiritualism, being a truth, must displace error in religion, thus becoming the religion of the world. This truth is built on facts; and as science appropriates all facts for its foundations, it must of necessity be in time accorded a science, notwithstanding twelve years' repetition of proof before acknowledgement by its present day professors.

This question it seems to me should be: Shall Spiritualists first bend their energies to making this a religion? leaving the scientists to take their own slower methods of formulating it?

The needs of better conditions in the mortal life and of preparation for the real life beyond this, prove the necessity for a religion whose effort shall be for this work now undone.

If we go back to the inception of this nineteenth century revelation, we find it reduced in simples to the rediscovery of the spirit world, the fact of intercommunication, with the great lesson of brotherhood and economic equality given us on every hand from the life beyond.

This lesson is a continuous one, and intercourse proves it is not turned in this direction alone, but that the great work of those gone before us is to lift others up higher, to make somebody happier. Our present competitive methods are selfish in the extreme. It makes angels weep to see earth's misery, and it amazes the investigator to find out the hells of suffering, awaiting the souls who enter spirit life with the preparation given them from the religions now prevailing here. To-day's greatest need is the preparation for spirit life which Spiritualism only as a practical religion can give.

It is useless to hold to a dictionary or popular definition of the word religion. We have as a cult that which is exclusively our own, a knowledge of the future life proven by facts. In acquiring this knowledge, we get nothing further on the subject of Deity. Spiritualism has nothing to do with the God question; let each settle this in his own mind.

As a religion Spiritualism should be built on its own original lines. We ought not to borrow, and with the great field before us there is no occasion. The word religion to the Spiritualist should mean exactly what this revelation has proven, only this and nothing more, as it holds no authority save proven truth. Its work on earth is to inaugurate a practical brotherhood and economic equality. Familiarity with its psychic demonstration makes a preparation for the life that is to be, whereby much distress and suffering on its entrance will be avoided. Thus a religion which not the new professors, but the laity at large can use, is the great need of the world to-day.

To do good with that we have received, it should come into general use. This must be effected by effort and enthusiasm, as all great religious movements have ever been done. A cold intellectual treatment will not do—the heart as well or more than the head, must be enlisted. Why not, when on the basis of human affection the whole things rests? This work can never be done by scientific analysis. This is all right in its place, but does not cover the needs of humanity at large.

But the real reason for making this a religion lies in existence of the prevailing systems, whose fundamentals are proven through the united testimony of of those who have passed over, to be entirely false and to be indirectly the cause of the vice and crime that everywhere here abounds.

Spiritualism has come to show a better way—one that cannot be done by the scientist, but must be by the humanitarian through religious effort. Man is already beginning the change from worship of a Deity to devotion for his fellow man, and Spiritualism now opportunely comes to complete the change

Without detracting from the value of a scientific estimate of Spiritualism, its use as a religion must be the means of advancing humanity from its present low estate in an upward direction till it reaches the highlands of heaven.

MISS MAE JENKINS.

Her Story.

"I suffered for five years with the most terrible inflammation of the eyes that could possibly be. As the result this inflammation and strong treatment that the doctors gave me, left scums, granulated lids, and scars all over my sight. When I was nine years old, I took what the doctors called scrofulous sore eyes, which were sometimes better and then worse, until I was fourteen years old; then they got worse rapidly and in a few months ulcers came on my eyes and and I got so bad I could not open them or stand the light at all, suffering great pain and inflammation. I went to an eye infirmary and was treated and got no better; but with every cold I would get worse and have ulcers and great pains. The doctors treated my eyes with caustic and nitrate of silver, and it left a scar on my right eye that year, and two years later, with other attacks of ulcers and more nitrate of silver, scars and scums commenced to grow on both eyes and with every cold a new ulcer would come and leave a little thicker scar, until about a year ago, when I wrote to Dr. Coffee of Des Moines, Iowa, I had to be led about. I could not see to go around. And had been in that condition for a year. My constitution had run down and my health was very bad, blood thin and watery. It took about six weeks under Dr. Coffee's treatment to improve my eyes and sight so that I could get around; but ever since then my eyes have steadily improved and the ulcers have quit coming, the scars have absorbed, and my sight is almost as perfect as it ever was."

The Absorption Treatment is Local and constitutional and cures AT HOME, at small expense and without operations, inflammed eyes, cataracts, (any stage) granulated lids, weak or watery eyes, wild hairs, blindness—complete paralysis of optic nerve excepted—incurable cases not taken.

Write for the free book for yourself or a friend today. It may mean sight for a sufferer.

GENERAL SURVEY.

D. W. Hull contemplates a trip to Oregon and Washington some time this coming spring or summer, and would like to make engagements in advance for societies in these states, and also on the routes there. The route taken will depend somewhat on the calls for services.

E. W. Sprague and wife, missionaries for the N. S. A., wish to make arrangements to visit every local society of Spiritualists in the state of Indiana. They will gladly respond to calls to organize and charter societies. Wherever there are seven persons or more who are Spiritualists there should be a society formed. Parties wishing their services, please write them at once. Address them at Rochester, Ind.

Dr. H. C. Andrews writes: "I am now ready, after two months' rest from the spiritual platform, to accept engagements to lecture and give messages for any societies wishing my services. Terms reasonable; correspondence solicited. Permanent address, Jonesboro, Ind., Box 135."

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley will have some open dates after March 30, and wishes to correspond with societies wishing a lecturer and test medium. Her address until Feb. 24, is 713 Monson street, Peoria, Ill., after that General Delivery, Pittsburg, Pa. She also has part of July and August open for camp work.

Jones Goldsmith writes from Evansville, Ind.: "Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, representing the N. S. A., have come and gone, and the people who heard them while in our city are better for their having been with us. Mr. Kates and wife served the Evansville (Ind.) Society of Spiritualists while in our city, Feb. 6 to 11, and had good crowds to greet them at all meetings held, the church in which services were held being filled at all meetings and all were high in their praise of the manner in which Spiritualism was presented to the public, and we are satisfied if we had more mediums of their class the growth of Spiritualism would be wonderful. We have our own church here and hold regular meetings every Sunday morning and evening; also a children's lyceum, and in order to continue the good work done by Mr. and Mrs. Kates we would like to hear from good speakers and test mediums who have open dates or who are coming our way, but no one need write unless they can come well recommended by the N. S. A. or some chartered society."

Mrs. L. A. Barr writes from Lyons, Pa.: "Mrs. Demorest is instructing the people in the beautiful philosophy of Spiritualism, and expects to establish a chartered society before leaving Reading."

The Chicago Spiritual Alliance will commence its meetings on Sunday, Feb. 23, at Lakeside Hall, corner Thirty-first street and Indiana avenue. Will meet regularly at 3 and 7:45 p. m. Mrs. Ella Johnson Bloom will be present to represent the Illinois State Spiritualist Association. Mrs. Mary Elmo, pastor.

W. C. Jessup writes: "Mrs. Gehring and I have just closed a three weeks' engagement at Elwood, Ind., with grand success, making several new converts and creating great enthusiasm among the believers. We will be here one week more. The work starts out here favorably."

Prof. J. W. Kenyon gave a course of twelve lectures on Psychology, in Spiritual Hall, Worcester, Mass. They were highly appreciated. For open dates for camps and season of 1902-3, address him at 95 North street, Fitchburg, Mass.

Mrs. L. A. Beam writes from Lawton, Mich.: "On Feb. 10 and 12, Mr. E. W. Sprague, of Jamestown, N. Y., who is doing missionary work in the spiritual field for the N. S. A., gave two very able and instructive lectures here on organizing, and teaching the method of Spiritualism. Mrs. Sprague followed each lecture with messages from those who have passed to a higher life. About thirty were given; all were recognized. After the last lecture on Wednesday night a society was organized, which will be known as the First Spiritualist Society of Lawton. The following officers were elected: President, H. A. Thomas; vice-president, G. H. Prentice; secretary, Mrs. L. A. Beam; treasurer, Mrs. H. M. Prentice; trustees, Mrs. L. A. McKinney, J. Booth and E. W. McNeil."

M. L. Barnet writes from Wisconsin: "I graduated from the church more than fifty years ago, and my conversion was thorough. I had been a member for about fifteen years; had been made first a church clerk, then a deacon, and subsequently a licentiate preacher, the latter with much reluctance on my part, for I had already begun to have some trouble in regard to the soundness of the doctrines I was to teach. I began to question the doctrines of the fall of man, total depravity, the scheme of salvation, the atonement, and in fact, the whole religious system, and while considering these subjects the rappings at Hydesville began to attract considerable attention. I with many others began to form home circles, and it was soon demonstrated there was much above and beyond what was contained in our philosophy. These circles were continued until the evidence was so overwhelming that it was no longer possible to resist it. The result was the old theories were abandoned and my church offices were resigned and my membership discontinued, and I took my stand upon the rock of reason and common sense where I have since stood, and where I expect to stand. All this, perhaps, is of little interest to, and many not be to any one else, but I felt like giving the little sketch of my inconsequential experience. I am now in the ninety-fourth year of my age. You can judge of my mental condition by what I have written. My wife and I have lived together almost sixty-nine years. She will be eighty-seven years the 26th of next month, and both enjoying a fair measure of health."

Spiritualism Alive in Nebraska.

I take pleasure in sending you herewith a brief report of a series of meetings held in Fullerton, Nebraska, under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. A. Scott Bledsoe, who are traveling missionaries under the direction and auspices of the Nebraska State Spiritualists Association.

They arrived at our little town last Tuesday afternoon, and gave us three rousing meetings.

Our opera house which is a large building, was crowded at each meeting, and very great interest was manifested by our people throughout the entire proceedings.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Scott Bledsoe left Friday morning for Council Bluffs, Ia., where they have gone to continue their work on behalf of the Association. They came to our place well recommended and are in full sympathy with the National organization.

The work which they did here was simply grand; they have set our people to thinking along new lines, and wondering if after death it is not possible for a person to live again.

We have quite a liberal element in this town, and by this element the thought advanced has been well received, and our people are thinking—thinking.

Mr. A. Scott Bledsoe is an orator of the first order and his wife is a splendid speaker and a first-class psychic, and it is a matter unsettled in my mind, which which of the two is the most gifted in their line of work.

Now I do not wish my communication to be too long, but I do wish to let the world know that we here in Nebraska are hard at work and are striving to allow the masses to learn that "there is life for all after death," and no matter what others may be doing, that we have yet some good, lively, and vigorous Spiritualists left in Fullerton, Neb.

ALONZO THOMPSON.

Said to Be a Wonderful Medium.

I write to say something about a medium that you have said something about in your paper two or three years ago while he was in Stockton, Cal. This medium is Hiram Cameron. He came to Stockton some eleven years ago from Springfield, Ill. He is a mechanic, a native of the South Sea Islands. He is limited in education, but in many respects above the average man in intelligence. He was until some three years a pronounced Atheist, but by accident discovered he was a medium while in company with myself, and from that time on has been frequently giving seances of a very remarkable csharacter. These seances have convinced a great many hard-headed skeptics. He has been subjected to all kind of tests, by many different persons, but to date he has never been exposed as a fraud. I am an old Spiritualist and will state so far as I know, Hiram Cameron is in some respects the most remarkable medium in the field of phenomena to-day. He gives both light and dark seances. The spirits at times furnish their own light and at other times they will light the lamp in any part of the room. While light the spirits will come out of the cabinet into the room. One Italian spirit, who gives his name as George Donduro, will sometimes stand outside the cabinet and play the most perfect music on the guitar. Musicians say it cannot be excelled. At almost every seance there will be from two to six musical instruments played at the same time and all in perfect harmony.

Hiram has but recently moved to Sacramento, and has just began giving seances. At this time he has given nine in all. They were of so startling nature that some or most of the audience could not believe them genuine. After one of these seances was over a prominent contractor and builder asked if he might have the privilege of making a thorough examination of the whole room and house and if no evidence of fraud was discovered, then to have the privilege of putting up a six-foot wire fence all around his little cabinet. His request was immediately granted, and two more skeptical contractors added to the first one. So the next day they set to work and examined everything about the house, and finding no evidence of fraud, went to one of their shops and constructed a wire fence six foot high and inclosed the cabinet, fastening the fence firmly to the floor. Through this fence they constructed a small door, so that all who desired could inspect the inside before and after the seance. This door was locked with two Yale locks and a paster placed over the key-holes, and when locked the keys were given to a skeptic. The instruments were all hanging up in the cabinet when the seance began, but when over they were out of the cabinet and sitting against the wire fence. The audience consisted of fifty people and all that were musicians joined in saying that the guitar, mandolin and autoharp playing could not be excelled by mortal. There was much talking by the spirits, and a number of full-formed materializations. They came out to the fence.

So the good work goes on. Cameron is a poor man in the world's goods, but immensely rich in spiritual phenomena. Here is the long-sought-for opportunity for the Psychical Research Society and all skeptics, and especially one Ralph E. Sylvestre, who sends out a book to teach bogus phenomena. I wish to say if he can expose Cameron's manifestations, he can make a barrel of money.

I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months, and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Geo. W. Taylor passed to spirit life at Independence, Iowa, Christmas Eve, at the age of 91. He was thoroughly convinced of the truth of Spiritualism. He had been a great sufferer. He was respected and beloved by all. Funeral services were conducted by Rev. S. L. Crum, of Manchester, Iowa. F.

Marguerite Pearl Oakes was born the 29th of January 1901. On Dec. 13, 1901, she passed to spirit life, at Helvin, N. D. She was a very bright and loveable little child, the sunshine and happiness of the home, and loved by all who knew her. C.

Mrs. Ruth Faul passed to spirit life, Dec. 16, 1901, at Council Bluffs, Iowa. She was a Spiritualist for over 25 years and died strong in the faith.

MYRTLE FAUL.

W. H. McCarron, an aged citizen of Maquoketa, Iowa, departed this life, Tuesday morning, after several weeks of severe torture. He was a man well known, a deep thinker, liberal and spiritual, well posted in the late problems of politics, philosophy and all the isms, and to know him one would wish to be more like him. He will be sadly missed, for we depended on him to answer all difficult problems. Brother Barrett officiated in the last rites on Friday afternoon. L. C. H.

Leo Burdette McKey, the six-months old son of Mr. and Mrs. Chas McKey, passed to the higher life on January 30. The services were conducted by the writer. HARRY J. MOORE.

Daniel F. Culver passed to spirit life, January 9, 1902, aged 55 years. He was born in the town of Pulaski, Jackson county, Mich. He was a Spiritualist from childhood. He belonged to the Masonic order. Services were conducted by Mrs. Emily King, of Butler. He leaves a wife, a sister and adopted daughter to mourn his loss. COR.

Passed to spirit life, March 21, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Snow, Marcus Snow, Jr., their dear son, aged 31 years. He was a believer in Spiritualism; also the family, all being members of the First Spiritualist Church of Bemidji, Minn., and one of the most highly respected families in the city. Words of love and sympathy were spoken to the loved ones left behind, and to the many friends who gathered at the residence to pay their respects, by Mrs. Ted Smith, chaplain of the First Spiritualist Church.

MRS. TED SMITH.

Lewis Tucker passed to spirit life, from his home in Norwalk, O., Jan. 31, in the 78th year of his age. Mr. Tucker was born a Spiritualist; absolutely honest and just in thought and dealing, with the purity of motive and sincerity of a child. No one ever sought his aid in vain. So upright himself, he could not believe others dishonest, and experience even did not convince him of the fact. The funeral was held at his residence, Hudson Tuttle officiating.

* * * *

Passed to spirit life, Feb. 8, 1902, Mr. Edwin Crawley, of Newport, Ky., in his 76th year. The funeral services took place Tuesday afternoon Feb. 11, at his late residence, conducted by the writer. The announcement had been made by the city papers that the funeral was to be of the Spiritualistic order; he being the president and founder of the Spiritualist temple, and long before the appointed hour the residence was thronged with friends of the deceased and members of the Temple congregation, and it is estimated that over 1,500 persons viewed the remains. For twelve years Brother Crawley has been identified with this society, and it was through his efforts and liberality that the beautiful temple on Overton street was built, and dedicated to Spiritualism and its lessons of life, on his 75th birthday, last September, and now stands as a monument to his memory.

J. O. M. HEWITT.

A New Treatment for Deafness and Catarrh.

Bradford McGregor, of Cincinnati, O., a well-known demonstrator of applied sciences, asserts as a fact that catarrh and deafness can be cured, this assertion following his personal experience. Having suffered for years with catarrh, which resulted in very poor health and almost total deafness, his condition became such that specialists refused longer to treat him, saying his case was hopeless. Thus thrown upon his own resources, after using all known applications, he finally devised a new method of treatment based upon a principle entirely different from anything he had ever used or heard of, and cured himself with it. His hearing is perfect now, health good and no catarrh. The success of this remarkable treatment in the many tests made upon those similarly afflicted has been phenomenal, and to further extend its usefulness and to prove that it will cure, a free trial and full explanation will be sent by Mr. McGregor to any who suffer and will address him at 430 Lincoln Inn Court, Cincinnati, O., and send twenty cents to pay the expense only for registering and mailing.

Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. The reader will be amazed to see the curious facts here combined in support of this power of the human mind, which will resolve a thousand doubts and difficulties, make geology plain as day, and throw light on all subjects now obscured by time. Price, $1.50. In three volumes, cloth bound, $1.50 each. Postage, 10c per copy.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature: Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 1, 1902. NO. 640.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF SPIRITUALISM

To the Evolution of the Final and Universal Religion, as Illustrated in the Biblical Story of Samson.

An Address by Rev. Geo. Chainey, at the State Spiritualist Convention.

By Spiritualism I do not mean my Spiritualism or yours inclusively, but that vast movement and flood of awakened interest in psychic and spiritual intelligence and consciousness that is rising ever higher from day to day in the realm of religion.

There is a religion that shall swallow up the religions as the serpent rod of Moses devoured the serpents of the Egyptians. There is a faith or substance of the life and knowledge of God that shall take the place of all other faiths.

What special contribution has been made and is now being made to the perfect life for which we are all consciously or unconsciously seeking by this movement, and of which this association is a part? The very rudest and crudest phenomenalism of psychic force was the beginning of this vast wave that even now mounts up to the very throne of God.

When materialism seemed ready to engulf us in the Charybdis of despair, the monster Scylla allowed us to pass on by simply plucking from us our former understanding. While our first intelligence of the meaning of these things had to be revised, the facts remained and we stood face to face with the reality of undiscovered powers and the realization that a consciousness of life once gained was something that could no more fall out of existence than space or time. We owe a debt of gratitude to all who, in spite of the strangeness and credulity of many of the earlier manifestations, have yet persevered in seeking to understand and reduce them to order and service.

Everything great has to be small at the beginning. All things are first simple, then complex, and at last simple again: To-day we are sometimes overwhelmed with the complexity that this great spiritual awakening has assumed. Every day sees the birth of some new centre of activity and differentiation. What shall reduce them all to the final simplicity? Is there any one among them that is going to devour all the others? By no means. Yet each has its place and its work to do. Let them come all. The more the better. In them all is the One who shall yet redeem them all from their limits and throw down the barriers that keep them from being one fold led by one shepherd.

All are manifestations of the Spirit of God working either in time or from eternity. When these two are seen as Father and Son, the life of the heavens and the earth, in all their many divisions will become one flesh or undivided state of universal intelligence and cosmic consciousness. Many are called but few are chosen. All states in Truth are called to serve in Time, but only the few great truths and realities that include the many can have place in the great finality.

What life is to be was foreseen and foreknown by God from the beginning. Strange and wonderful as the way of our pilgrimage has been, we shall know at last that so great a result could not have been achieved by anything less than all this mighty toil of the heavens and of the earth to come together.

Though the final religion is to be four-square, with all the winds of heaven holding together all things of spirit and body, soul and mind, the only way to this glorious consummation was through separate degrees and epochs of enlightenment. Life in the East and West, North and South, long grew and developed apart from each other: so has it been in spirit and body, soul and mind.

But as to-day all the mighty peoples and divisions of our planet are meeting and mingling together in a common life, so is it in the larger realities of which they are but the types. Though the heavens have persecuted us with their mighty mystery, it has been for our good. By seeking, knocking, watching, and asking at these closed doors they have at last opened to disclose to us all the things long hidden.

Though the Bible has been to us a perplexing mystery and a source of division, it has given us the privilege of seeking to understand it, and by the help of present Revelation will yet become a means of unification and solidarity of all religions into Religion.

Among the many activities of the present time, the Spirit has held me for many years to the toil of comprehending the nature of Revelation. It is because of this I would illustrate my theme from this source. To me the Bible is not the history of material things but of spiritual. It is the record in symbolic language of the way in which man is being created in the image and likeness of God. The image is the Substance of God. This substance is the universal ether—the body and consciousness of God. The likeness is the intelligence and character of God. We are to know and become like unto God, both in consciousness and intelligence. Consciousness is feminine and intelligence masculine; male and female made he them.

In our perfect state these two will be equal. We shall be just as conscious of things unseen as we are now intelligent. We shall not only know that yonder is Asia and Africa, but we shall be continually conscious of them. We shall not only see our friends outside of us, but find them also a part of our own consciousness.

Now the strange phenomena that have often perplexed us in dream and vision and other ways are but the beginnings of this larger life. They are strange and sometimes even repellant because the unlovely root comes before the flower and fruit.

This consciousness of which I speak has to be evolved in separate departments before it can be realized in its cosmic completeness and fulness of joy. We have also to know these divisions of consciousness incompletely even before we can attain to a perfect marriage. These are the adulterous or incomplete unions represented in this marvelous story of Samson. He is of the tribe of Dan—judge. Dan is not one of the twelve. The twelve tribes of Israel are the twelve gifts or states of intelligence and consciousness that are to be the permanent states of our universal intelligence and cosmic consciousness. These twelve correspond with the months of the year and the twelve signs of the zodiac.

In the Sacred Year there was, every third year, an intercalary month. This month belongs to Dan—psychic intelligence and consciousness. Three is the number of Knowledge. In every enlarging circle of Knowledge the awakening and reappearance of psychic energy is the Divinely appointed means. When knowledge is complete and the goal is won, Dan shall disappear, because the psychic and soul energy will then be one. This is why Spiritualism is to-day taking on the higher realization of the Soul quality of being. This is the meaning of the tribe of Dan leaving its first place and going to the North—the region of the soul. Samson—solar, a mighty force of heat and light, breaking up the icy fetters of creed and dogma, is the last epoch of this reviving force. He is the child of Manoah—rest. Like Noah, Manoah is the gift of hearing in revelation. The wife of Manoah is barren, for consciousness in revelation is at times unfruitful. These fields lie barren for summer tillage and more abundant increase.

Manoah is a man of Zorah—hornet. The hornet is an ephemeral form of summer life. It can live in the heat but not in the cold. There is much in these writings about flies. There is the plague of flies. Hornets are also one of the agencies by which God drives out the Canaanites—the low states of merchandise and exchange in religion before the Israelites—the high and final states that are to endure forever. These are the many new but ephemeral forms of religious life that spring up in a time of transition to dispute the land with the old established forms. They are the miscellaneous column of the Sunday announcements that have no recognized standing. Even the foxes have holes and the birds have nests but the Son of man has not where to lay his head.

At this time of barrenness of consciousness in revelation the Angel of the Lord appeared to this woman. The Angel of the Lord is the Holy Spirit. Every angel is a messenger or message from God. This message appears as a man and yet is recognized as an Angel. In the depths of consciousness we oftimes receive messages from God in dream or waking vision. This message bringing the promise of a son comes in the absence of the man. We often experience wonderful things in consciousness before we can comprehend them with our intelligence.

Many of the first experiences of the present spiritual movement have been of this order. God does better for us than we can devise or think. We are not the makers of Truth but its creation. These mysterious psychic and spiritual experiences in consciousness come to arouse our intelligence to further effort. The man entreats that the Angel may come to him also. We long to know the meaning as well as to see the vision. This child of promise is to be a Nazarene. Christ the Lord is also a Nazarene—one separated. This Truth is to grow up in the world apart from all the recognized and established authorities. No razor is to come upon the head. The hair denotes intelligence. The intellect is to be free and not cut back to any standard or creed. The seven locks of Samson are the intelligence of the seven great divisions of the Spirit of God. To be a Nazarene is also to abstain from wine and strong drinks. To take strong drink in the spiritual sense is to stimulate yourself towards the spiritual to the injury of the natural. Many are weak because they are afflicted with this besetting sin. They want to be perfect now. But strength must come before sweetness. Young men and women must postpone enjoyment and lay the foundation of noble strength if they would know the sweets of pure and strong love.

In the general, mankind has not yet learned to postpone enjoyment. We are often like children who plant seeds and then unearth them before they have time to sprout. Prompted of desire we pluck the fruit that time would ripen and sweeten when it is but green and sour. We covet the life of the heavens before we have taken possession of the earth. We would be Gods before we have been men. We crave for fame and recognition for the first callow performance of youth instead of nobly waiting for the just reward of the fruits of toil. When this shall be corrected and man shall know how to put restraint on the fiery impatience of youth and cultivate and mature the strength of thought and depth of consciousness on which joy depends, a great step will have been taken in the progress of our world. The secret of this strength is wrapt up in the meaning of the strength of Samson. It is to learn to be much alone and to stand alone. It is to be free of mind and yet loyal to all that is highest and best. It is to seek the spiritual without disloyalty to the natural and the natural without neglect of the spiritual. It is to go further than the new and ephemeral forms of life and yet not to submerge yourself entirely in a state of life too far in advance of your generation.

The Spirit of the Lord began to move Samson at times in the camp of Dan, between Zorah—hornet, and Eshtaol—hollow or secret way. This is between the many new forms and the things as yet altogether hidden and secret.

The Children of Israel are at this time enslaved by the Philistines—strangers. Samson is born to begin but not to complete their deliverance from this bondage. The Philistines in these writings are the ecclesiastical, ceremonial and external conditions that long enslave Religion. Religion is brought at times into this condition of bondage for the development of individual strength. Were it not for this bondage we could not have the opportunity of developing our strength and understanding by heroic and personal resistance. This is the law of growth. The established and settled order of religion under ecclesiastical direction is under certain conditions a vast practical good. It holds up and keeps alive the fact of man's relation to God when this might otherwise die out and be forgotten. But to let the ecclesiastical order and method get complete control and direction of religion would surely bring death in another way.

While God gives religious light mingled with darkness to the external church He sends these new awakenings from time to time to weaken this externalism and to give the church to religion and individual freedom. It will be impossible to draw out at this time the whole meaning of this story of Samson. You will remember that it is mostly a story both of unhappiness in the marriage relation and of illegal love relations.

Four women play a part in this drama. The woman of Timnath—restraint, whom Samson obtains for a wife; her more beautiful younger sister who is offered in her place; the harlot of Gaza—strong place, and Delilah—pining, the woman of Sorek—choice vine.

Everything else is connected with these relationships. These are four states of consciousness. They are not, however, the same as the four states or wives of Jacob. These four represent each a state of double consciousness. They are the time of the uniting and splicing together of states of consciousness that have before been kept in separate departments. The final strength and perfection of life is to come with the holding and blending together of all the great divisions. This will be the Cosmic Consciousness that is to-day the brightest hope on the horizon of humanity. But this must be approached gradually.

Samson's first love is the woman of Timnath—restraint, a daughter of the Philistines. This love is of the Lord to make an occasion against the Philistines. On the way to seek this wife he slays a young lion that comes out against him. After this he finds honey in the carcass of the lion. On this is based a riddle: "Out of the eater came forth meat and out of the strong came forth sweetness." Samson loses the riddle, because they prevail against him through his wife, so that he can say, "If ye had not ploughed with my heifer ye had not found out my riddle." To pay the forfeit Samson slays some of the Philistines. It is only by the help of Psychic consciousness that the Church gets any advantage over the new force threatening its destruction. Such advantage, however, weakens them externally even while strengthening them internally.

This wife of Samson is the union of spiritual and mind consciousness. Though married to her, she is afterwards given to a friend of Samson. This friend is the materialistic mind. The ecclesiastical consciousness is after all bestowed more upon the materialistic phase of thought than upon the psychic. For this Samson sends the foxes, or jackals, with firebrands between their tails into the corn of the Philistines. Jackals hunt in the night. Those who have control over the world of dream and vision by Psychic Intelligence are sending forth many destructive influences into ecclesiastical states of knowledge. They can do this because of the friendliness of the church to materialistic influences.

Wearied by this order of teaching, people gladly invite the psychological influences that are making rapid inroads upon the old forms of teaching.

The younger sister of Samson's wife is the union of mental and physical states of consciousness. Though she is beautiful, we are not told that Samson accepted her. As the result of the rousing of the Philistines in revenge, Samson is bound with new ropes at their demand by the men of Judah.

Judah is the gift of Labor. Those who labor seek to put new bonds upon this strong power of psychic intelligence. But these bonds to this strength are but as flax in the fire and Samson, finding a jawbone of an ass smites them again.

The ass is the symbol of the moral consciousness. Christ comes riding upon an ass. This is the power of moral earnestness and consciousness allied to psychic intelligence. Though weary from this effort, Samson is revived by a stream of water flowing from a hollow place in this jawbone.

His next alliance is with a woman of Gaza. This is consciousness of body and soul. Though the Philistines think to take him here he arises in the night and carries away the gates of the city, the posts and bar to the top of a hill before Hebron—conjunction. This is the conjunction between Time and Eternity. When man shall know the secret of the union of physical and soul states of consciousness he will overlook the things of both Time and Eternity. This is the city given to Caleb—dog of God, the faithful Spirit of Time. Here Abraham first obtained a foothold in the sacred land and bought a sepulchre called Machpelah—a doubling, for this is the doubling of the drawing out of the things of Eternity into Time and the lifting up of the things of Time into Eternity.

Here Truth puts off its mortal form and obtains the Resurrection of the Life immortal.

Samson's next love is Delilah—the union of soul and spiritual consciousness. She lives in Sorek—choice vine. The vine is the symbol of revelation. This is a choice quality of revelation. By conspiring with this one, the Lords of the Philistines get Samson in their power. The first means resorted to, faith. He finally reveals that the secret of his strength is in the seven locks of his hair that have hitherto been unshorn. When through this choice order of revelation, the ecclesiastical state in religion shall gain the secret of psychic and spiritual strength in this sevenfold law and life, this great power will seem to be in their hands.

In reducing this knowledge to an intellectual system they will weaken this hitherto unconquered strength and put out the beautiful eyes of vision. But though the vision come not again in the psychic state, it will be renewed in a day when the psychic and soul quality shall grow together.

Though Samson be condemned to grind at the mills of the Philistines, yet these cannot resist the temptation to take delight in this possession. They bring him out of the prison into the temple of Dagon—fish-god, to make sport for them. The introduction, even for sport, of psychic intelligence and energy into the temple of mystery is the day of its doom. This temple rests upon two pillars. These pillars are intelligence in consciousness and consciousness in intelligence.

Samson's hair has grown again. A young lad is leading him who suffers him to lean against these pillars. This young lad is a new and Divine understanding of spirit and body, soul and mind. When this returning strength shall grasp the two pillars on which all things in heaven and earth depend, the temple of mystery will be shaken to its foundations. Then will the powers of ecclesiasticism perish, Samson dies with the Philistines. This energy dies in this state to live again in a better.

The end of ecclesiasticism is not the end of religion but of religions. This is not the death of association but the death of association at the cost of individual liberty.

In the perfect day now coming all shall be free. All shall be taught of God. All shall know that God is. The human consciousness will palpitate with the Divine. Man's intelligence will be open and free on the unfenced commons of the universe. The old and established will no longer ignore the new nor the new scornfully despise the old. We shall know the old in the new and the new in the old. Man will no more claim to be God, nor God be glorified to the dishonor of man. The long warfare will be past. Man will have lifted himself into the life of God and the life of God in man will be the life of the fulness of the heavens in the earth and of the earth in the heavens.

This is the great consummation and restoration of all things in a world without end. Amen.

PROPHECIES

And Their Startling Fulfillment.

I would like to testify to three prophecies that have come to pass within the past eight months.

My daughter May has of late developed clairvoyance and clairaudience to a marked degree. The first was June 28, 1901. May was in Kansas City at the time, and she became very depressed and worried, as she saw things at home in great confusion and a building burning, and I was in great distress. On the 5th of July our barn caught mysteriously on fire, burning one horse, and destroying all our hay, oats, corn and machinery. I was awfully distressed over our loss.

Again, the 20th of October, May saw a man's arm covered with blood and badly cut. She said some one would get hurt very soon. This also was true. The next day my son got his hand badly hurt by a huge rock falling on his arm and hand, cutting the nail completely off his second finger, and nearly crushing his arm. Again, October 31, May saw our barn being rebuilt, and as the roof was nearly all shingled, she saw my son fall and almost killed. On January 5, 1902, my son was climbing to the top of the barn to see the hayfork track, when he fell and narrowly escaped death, cracking his breast-bone and several ribs. He was unconscious several days, and even at this writing he can't remember of his falling, or going upon the ladder.

I consider these timely warnings are remarkable. The roof was not quite completed, just as my daughter said it was.

Now how are these phenomena accounted for? If not shown my daughter by spirit power, who can explain? Possibly Mr. Jamieson or some of his followers can tell.

May was not hypnotized, as no mortal was near her at the vision periods. It certainly was not mind-reading, for the events had not occurred; hence could not be in any mortal's mind. She was not dreaming, for it occurred while at her work. Was it imagination? Perhaps, like a professor said, "'Twas guess-work, and guess-work was good as any long as it hit."

To testify to the phenomena and teachings of our spirit friends is certainly our duty. Many say, "Why don't our friends warn us of approaching danger." I would like to ask, don't they warn us of danger? as in the foregoing. But do we mortals heed these timely warnings? My son is very skeptical to any spirit phenomena. Whenever May would tell what she saw, he would laugh at her and say "It was her imagination," but her prophecies were true, and they are only a few of the wonderful things she sees and hears. The psychic influences that hover around us like a cloud certainly give us lessons to study, instead of turning a deaf ear and ridiculing and scoffing at the powers and laws of which we know so little. We are but in our infancy as to knowing how and whence they come and to what power and good they can be developed. "Prove all things and hold fast that which is good."

O listen to the angel warnings,
As they hover round our earth, so near,
Gently guarding every action,
Trying every heart to cheer.

CLEAN LIVES.

The Moral Personnel of Spiritualists.

I am incessantly being told that the Spiritualists are a bad people, and this statement is usually based upon the fact of some improper local persons who have assumed official care of our cause, or a class of pretended mediums who are drunken, dissolute or tricky. The whole body are judged by these few who occasionally dare to represent Spiritualism.

It is painfully true that our cause has had some advocates, as officers of societies, speakers and mediums, who have not been representative people morally. Such persons handicap any cause, especially a religious one. But, all new movements in the religious world are attacked as embracing immoral people. Jesus was so accused, so were the apostles and early Christians. It was only a few years ago that the Methodists were supposed to be the scum of the earth. Such claims are made by bigots, out of pure malice and prejudice.

Attacks upon character should be branded by the scorn of all decent people. It is the lowest possible attack that a human being can make upon another, and becomes a criminal libel when made against a class. Because there are immoral preachers and Christians, we should not, and do not, attack their system. Immorality runs riot in humanity. Christianity has not saved the people, because it has granted pardons and thus given a license. Jails and penitentiaries, and insane asylums are filled with Christian sectarists; and a Spiritualist or a Jew is hardly ever found in these institutions.

But when a Spiritualist does anything wrong, or gets mixed up in any human affair of dishonor or suspicion, the press always tells that he is a Spiritualist. But, a good Spiritualist who does something good, or passes to spirit life with an honorable earthly record, is reported as belonging to no church.

The Cincinnati Enquirer published lately the prospectus of a Chicago firm who manufactures accessories for fakirs to imitate spirit manifestations, and said, "This settles how mediums operate." Churches will employ a fakir who professes to expose by tricks the physical manifestations of spirits—and say that exposes Spiritualism. The press and pulpit accept the expose. This shows how gullible many supposedly wise men are.

Neither press nor church will allow life mediums to prove a genuine manifestation. They rule the people in ignorance, by appealing to prejudice; and shut against the truth.

What must we do? Plainly: So live that all people can find in us no guile. So protect our cause that morality in officials and members shall be a positive expression of the moral power of Spiritualism. The Spiritualists should exemplify Spiritualism in their lives!

Let us be careful to place moral people to the front as officials, speakers and mediums. We have a right to so protect our cause. If a censorship is necessary, let it be instituted at once! No moral medium will cry out against such. We must cease licensing because of possessing a psychic power. No self-respecting medium will want a certificate. His or her life is a certificate, and their honorable dealings will follow in reputation as will dishonor.

Thus a censorship becomes a protection equally with a possible condemnation. Pleading for honor and purity in life for all Spiritualists—and that no one who is debauched shall assume the "livery of heaven to serve the devil in," I plead for upholding our cause as a representative of a moral force before the world. Let us welcome all to our fold, but put forward the intellectual and moral members as our public representatives and exponents. Let me be the first to suffer, if guilty.

There is a need in this direction, that the public may have no opportunity to misjudge our whole fraternity by the nefarious acts of a few.

Amongst other letters of a similar character, I will quote the following from an earnest Spiritualist residing in Boston:

"I was glad to read your wholesome words, in a late issue of The Progressive Thinker, in which you named the responsibilities of the layman. I heartily believe it is high time the layman recognized his responsibility in this work, and stopped his cant about the public workers. Personally, I am glad to face this responsibility and meet it bravely but humbly, reverently and sincerely; and when those who stand in my humble class will meet as consecrated bodies I believe the fruitage of the labors of the public worker will be such as to surprise men, and rejoice angels."

This is an important matter for the earnest toiler in Spiritualism, and is as dependent upon the local adherent, or layman, as upon the public advocate. The personnel of the Spiritualists is moral, virtuous and intelligent. Let us do all we can to so prove it to the world.

To Struggling Societies.

A well-known speaker whose work is adapted to the building up of progressive thought and the teachings of the spiritual philosophy, will give his services to any society for Sunday meetings for three or six months, or possibly longer, provided some member of said society will furnish him employment on weekdays, at a reasonable salary.

The kind of employment must be something honorable, in a retail or wholesale mercantile establishment, assistant editor in a newspaper office, collector, or any position of trust where careful and painstaking help will be appreciated.

RELIGION.

All Religions Flow from a Common Source.

Each soul hath sprung from some great source,
The force of which doth guide,
With perfect law its onward course—
Nor will it be denied,
That as the ocean draws the dew,
From highest mountain wood,
E'en so, each soul with hopeful view
Is drawn tow'rd central good.
Now some may seek to walk the path,
With trembling feet, and fear
That this great source is filled with wrath,
And torments waiting near;
Or some may go just as they feel,
And laugh or cry or sing,
Some turn to cloister walls and kneel,
And think a demon's sting
Each impulse not by their creed taught,
Thus taking man, as all,
Count Nature's promptlings as but naught,
They to the unknown, call.
But though they fear, or deem all best,
Or live in constant prayer,
Though they deny all law, and jest,
At "hands just over there."
Yet magnet-like this mighty source
Draws through life's tangled wood
Each soul along its varied course
Unto the perfect good.

In every age and clime and in a multitude of ways men have sought to know of the source of being; and their conclusions have formed the various religions. The similarity of each and all religions indicates not only their relationship to each other but a common source from which they all came. Around these points of human good which strengthen, teach and comfort the race are, in every instance clustered creeds, ceremonies and holy (?) threats indicative of the condition of the people and the place in which they live.

All religious history is written with life blood and illustrated with human torches, because each religion as it grows in prominence and power forgets tolerance, and bigot-like seeks to control even if by force. Regardless of the bigotry and ignorance of religious teachings, the pure light of human brotherhood shines into the lives of some and leads them to try yet once again to have a religion of fact, not fancy, of demonstrated truth, not miraculous revelation. There has never been a human soul void of religious aspiration (to know spiritual things) yet many minds have never sought for a scientific explanation of a single thing in life; but all that actually sustains in religion, or lives on when creeds crumble and formulas pass, is the simple scientific fact around which is built the fanciful fabric. Spiritualism stands in the world to-day advocating tolerance; her majestic figure is recognized as the embodiment of scientific facts which permit of philosophical demonstration.

Spirit communion, the rejected stone in every religious arch, has as a scientific fact linked mortal and immortal life in unyielding clasp; has awakened most intense emotions in the minds of all who think seriously of it.

The scientific fact that the spirits of murderers and undeveloped beings return to the denizens of earth life, arouses the true religious spirit. "As ye have done it unto the least of them, ye have done it unto me."

Science may prompt man to learn the facts that undeveloped souls return to earth life for assistance to unfold, and that it is possible to hold circles or seances for the express purpose of aiding darkened souls; it may lead man to rejoice that it is possible for exalted intelligences to reveal much of the after life, but takes the awakening of man's religious self to say to the undeveloped brother or sister in the spirit life: "I in no wise condemn you and with human love I will give such light as I can to lead you higher;" that enables man to apply the teaching received to make life noble and true. By religion I mean the indwelling and constantly manifest spirit of love that has breathed in some form in all the rubbish that has been heaped before the world and called religion.

From Sinai where such ceremonies as killing goats and smearing the blood on the ears of the priest were ordered, and the confiscation of woman's virtue was justified, is heard, "Honor thy father and thy mother; steal not; covet not." Prince Gautama gives voice to sentiments that are beautiful, inspiring and truly religious, according to the highest sense of the term:

"Ye are not bound! the soul of things is sweet,
The heart of being is celestial rest stronger than woe is will; that which was good,
Doth pass to better-best.
Ye suffer from yourselves. None else compels,
None other holds you that ye live and die,
And whirl upon the wheel and hug and kiss
Its spokes of agony.
Its tire of tears, its nave of nothingness."

The Golden Rule of Jesus is but a quotation from every religion history mentions.

The stern cold facts of science, like flint, produce the spark (the thought) which falls upon the human heart, that tinder-like springs into a flame of religious fervor—a desire to know spiritual things and apply them to the experiences of each passing day.

The age demands a clearance of rubbish which lies stagnant upon the people with claims of being religion.

The waves of progress which flow unceasingly from the Source of Being have carried us to this point in human development.

Scientific religion is a possible thing; Spiritualism with her many scientific problems proven to the world aroused an emotion in me which I call religion. To recognize that an underlying Law of Good sustains.

To realize that all expressions of Life are eternal like the Law and that their course tends upward and onward (whether it suits me or not). To feel my relationship to each and all, seen and unseen, and to use every energy I possess for the general good, knowing that good and right thoughts and things never cease in their operation for Merciful Justice and Loving Law.

OFFICIAL INCOMPETENCE.

Doctor Batdorf and the Mails.

I am glad to learn that the fraud order against Dr. Batdorf, of Grand Rapids, Mich., has been revoked. This case illustrates how incompetent officials get into positions that enable them to exercise authority to gratify spleen and ruin a man's business, under the pretext of protecting the public.

That the United States mail service is not intended to favor gambling and vice, is a wholesome conclusion. No honest citizen will object to that, or wish to have unlimited license for fraudulent schemes conducted through the mails. But in carrying out this purpose Government, of course, must depend upon its agents, and these are all too often weak, ambitious upstarts, who use their office to gratify prejudice, and exercise their own petty tyranny against those whose business they have not the capacity to understand. Especially is this illustrated in the contemptible persecutions instituted in the name of law and justice, against progressive people, and liberal literature.

Behind them may be found the medical rings and religious intolerance that diffuses among low-grade politicians, and gets a leverage under postoffice appointments, by which they can persecute their superiors, with a pretense of doing official duty. Dr. Batdorf and Helen Wilmans come in for a share of this petty scheming, chiefly on account of their success. That is what troubles the bigots. If the progressive healers—clairvoyants, magnetizers, metaphysicians, and mediums—had never made successful headway, had never won the confidence of the sick by curing, and thus taking patients away from the regulars, there would be no arrests or persecutions, to protect the poor people from quacks. Mrs. Matteson, of Buffalo, has been a conspicuous target for that reason, and probably has been arrested more times than any other, and this fact is a certificate of her success in curing the sick. But they have never been able to convict her—though she frankly admits that she has no diploma from the medical authorities, and that she doctors the sick every day.

But Dr. Batdorf does much of his by the mails, though he is a regular graduate, and has practiced medicine for 20 or 30 years in honorable fellowship with the profession. But when he commenced advertising to diagnose and prescribe for absent patients, the old lunkers were alarmed, and as his business grew, which implied success which begat confidence with his patients, the alarm increased; and finally he was arrested, and his mail forbidden. After a trial he was acquitted, and objections withdrawn, and all went well, until a change in the under offices, and new postoffice inspector, who of course wanted to win notoriety by some smart act selected Dr. Batdorf for his victim, and by this interference totally ruined his business by prohibiting his correspondence with his patients. Now, after a year or more of this abuse of authority, the fraud order is withdrawn, and Dr. Batdorf is again free to practice his skill in curing; but how soon some official change may again impose upon the people through the recommendation of a local inspector with more bluff than brains, we cannot foretell. But the Doctor's many patients will, no doubt be glad to know that this studied imposition is for the time withdrawn.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

A Letter from a Man of 93.

To the Editor:—I have had the privilege of reading numerous articles in No. 638 of your paper. I was highly gratified with an article over the signature of C. H. M., in which he expressed my views in a very clear, concise and forcible manner. Also an article by Brother Loveland in which he treats the subject more elaborately and with great force. I have always been an admirer of his style and force of argumentation. I would, however, suggest an amendment to one of his paragraphs, which I have no doubt he will readily accept. After having given a definition of religion, he says: "Religion thus defined is no more holy than and other branch of science." Now my amendment would be to strike out the word "other," in which case I think his thought would be more clearly expressed. I am not in any sense to be considered a critic, for I have passed ninety-three years without arrogating to myself any such title role.

It struck me, however, while reading the sentence, that there was something not quite right, and I read it again and came against that little word, and I just drew my pencil across it, and that at least expressed my idea better than in its original form.

As I have said I was not among those invited to write, neither have I written other than to express the pleasure and satisfaction I have enjoyed in reading the articles of those who were invited, but an old man in his dotage may well be pardoned for taking little liberties that might not be tolerated in those of a more modern type. I would like to say a word in relation to another article I ran against, where an attempt was made to solve an infinite problem by the use of finite methods.

The attempt was made to demonstrate the existence of Deity by algebraic equations and geometrical lines and angles, and I believe he really thinks he has made a glorious success, and I think he has succeeded fully as well as any of his numerous predecessors, but am inclined to think on the whole that he had better take a post graduate course under the instruction of the celebrated author of Christian science, and then try again.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters From Prof. William Denton, Through the Mediumship of Carlyle Petersilea.

INTRODUCTORY.

While I was yet writing under the influence of Madame ——, the spirit form of a gentleman stood directly before me. I do not know whether another person could have seen him or not, but to me he was distinctly visible. He bowed defferentially, and gracefully extended his right hand which held an embossed card. He held the card up before my eyes and upon the card was written, William Denton, Wellesly, Mass.

I am sure whoever reads this will like to know how he looked.

He was a rather small man, with deep-set eyes, and it was hard for me to tell whether they were dark blue or a soft black; but, whether black or blue they were sparkling, bright and intelligent; his forehead was large, round and jutting; thin, but pronounced features; somewhat spare in form, and his bearing was suave, gentlemanly and dignified. He has since told me that he was an Englishman by birth and education.

As soon as he became distinctly visible to me, he seemed to approach and enter my body, and when I once more returned to myself, the following is what I found written, presumably through or with my own hand.

CARLYLE PETERSILEA.

LETTER NUMBER ONE.

Carlyle Petersilea, Professor of Music, Los Angeles, California—Dear Sir:—You expressed a wish to hear from me, and I am here in response to your desire. No person can earnestly desire anything but sooner or later that desire may meet with fulfillment. You are a musician; I was, and still am, a geologist, as you will still be a musician after you, too, pass through the gate called death.

You are interested in the harmony, rhythm and grouping of sounds. I was interested in examining, analyzing and grouping the various strata that go toward forming the earth's crust, but I was also interested in many other things, and I find that you, like myself, are also interested in much besides music, chiefly in that pertaining to the higher or spiritual life; this, also, interested me more than I shall ever be able to tell you; yet, even now, of the two, you are more gifted in spiritual things than am I. My mind naturally gravitates toward the rocks, toward the firm old earth, toward the washing billows of the restless ocean; yours toward the great eternal sound, rhythm and music of the spheres.

It is well that we differ, for if all were alike there would be no music. I am one sound in the scale of being, you are another. I am down among the bass notes, while you rapidly fly the whole gamut, yet all must rest firmly on the base, or bed-rock, after all. Without the earths there could be no heavens; without the earths no spiritual spheres could exist or be peopled with souls. If I had not first been developed upon the earth I could not now dwell within the heavens as a conscious being. When in the form of coarser matter—I say coarser because I am still within a form composed of matter in a more refined condition—I sought by every means in my power to obtain knowledge of a future state of being, and wanted proof that I should live after so-called death, or dissolution.

Many of you say that Denton was a Spiritualist, but I really did not call myself such—did not think there was sufficient proof—at least, as much as one could have desired. Certainly, I had witnessed some very surprising manifestations of power, call it occult power if you will, still after all was said and done, many doubts assailed me, and I know that such is the case with thousands of others on the mundane sphere. If I could bring you all positive evidence of immortality, I believe it would make me supremely happy and blest.

Possibly you may ask: "But, Mr. Denton, are you not happy now?"

No, not wholly and entirely happy, for no one who loves his fellow-man can be entirely happy while sin and misery abound on earth, also, in a certain degree, within the lower spheres. But I am a very busy man, working always, otherwise I might be exceedingly unhappy. I am happy when accomplishing some great and everlasting good.

Many of you say you know man exists after so-called death, for the phenomena witnessed at spiritual seances positively proves that he does; but those same phenomena do not prove it to all persons. There are, as you well know, many who think the root of the phenomena exists within man himself, and that the phenomena are not produced by discarnate intelligences. The greatest desire of my soul now is to prove to all men alike, without reserve, that man does exist after the dissolution of the material body, and I think I can never be quite happy until I have accomplished this herculean task, for, my friend, it is truly a task fit for Hercules himself.

I greatly fear the phenomena alone will never convince all men. All are aware that not an atom of matter can ever be lost or become nothing, consequently every atom that ever entered into the composition of the material form of man, woman or child, still exists somewhere within the great universal whole, yet all persons exist the same as before. The old atoms have been thrown off, while others have taken their places, but the great fear that besets mankind is that when the body lies stark, dead and cold, all is over; there is nothing more. When the machine ceases to run all is over and man knows no more forever.

My own mind, when I was with you, often took a turn in this direction, and thus I know that doubts of a future life are very disheartening and very hard to bear. If never a doubt assailed mankind the wheels of his life would run far more smoothly.

If I, like "Christian," could assail and demolish doubting castle, I would be willing to control you to write while the lamp of your earthly life continued to burn.

My dear professor, never a doubt assails your mind, consequently you are far happier than the majority of men. I am writing this message to you. If you choose to give it to the world I have no objection, but I do strongly object to a fictitious name. Never, while in the mortal form, was I ashamed of my name, nor did I ever intend to write anything of which I should be ashamed. I assailed the old Bible myths with all the power at my command, and tried with all my might to demolish theological dogmas. Together with my beloved wife, or my wife together with her beloved husband, we wrote a book called the "Soul of Things" and at the time when I fought dogmas and wrote such books the whole Christian world was arrayed against me. I sometimes felt as though I were Atlas with the weight of the world resting upon me. But it is over now. I have conquered the world and it rests beneath my feet. Every truth that I ever uttered, or wrote, is with me still; and oh, how glad I was to find that truth outweighed all my errors. Fortunate for the soul who arrives here to find that his errors are light and few while his truths shine more brightly than diamonds.

You will, no doubt, remember, my dear professor, that when I was within the mortal, I often, in imagination, descended into the imaginary hell of the Christian churches, or worked my way around and about it, that I might let the poor sufferer escape. Of course, I thought it to be all imagination, never dreaming that it could be real. What was my unbounded astonishment, on arriving here, to find that I actually had let out hundreds of thousands from the horrible pit of darkness, and that I really had, to a certain extent, extinguished the flames of hell.

Can you believe it, my dear professor? You really must, for it is the truth.

Thoughts are things.

I maintained that they were when with you below, and now find that it is true. As a man thinketh so is he. If a man thinks hell, he makes hell; if he thinks heaven, he creates heaven; and thus, when I thought I would like to go down into hell and liberate my brothers who were suffering there, I really did so, and thousands of souls have met me here with beaming eyes and radiant countenances, and as they grasped my hand and shook it, their words would be like this: "Heaven bless you, Brother Denton, for releasing us from outer darkness and the flames of hell."

At first I stared at them almost wildly. "Outer darkness? Flames of hell? Why, such things do not exist."

"Pardon us, Brother Denton, but they do—they really do."

I remember that I gasped for breath as I heard such words.

"You are deceiving me. Hell and the devil are simply imaginary things."

"Precisely so," replied they, "but what of the imagination? If hell and the devil do not exist, how about God and heaven? If one is imaginary, certainly the other must be also. You will soon find, dear brother, that thoughts are things, and a soul lives within the circle of its thoughts—its imagination—or the images which it reflects or creates. If it thinks hell, it reflects the image of hell which goes out from it as an object—a spiritual reality. If it pictures, or thinks of a devil, that devil is very apt to stand before it in an objective form. Thus, many of us, poor wretches, were in the darkness of error. We believed implicitly in hell and the devil and thought about them at all times, consequently as we thought so we were. We lived in our thoughts and they became objects about us.

"At first we did not know how to rid ourselves of such thoughts, and so we suffered the flames and tortures of hell, and every time your thoughts reached out toward the so-called imaginary hell, for enlightening and releasing the sufferers therein, as many as accepted your thoughts were released. Thus, here we stand in solid phalanx—we whom you have released from hell—and we are legion."

Now, my dear professor, this was real, and I will try to make it a little clearer to you, if possible.

You often say to your wife, when she asks you what you are thinking about, that you are not thinking at all, that you scarcely ever think, that your soul—that is you yourself—is living in a world of music; you hear it at all times and seasons; you are never outside of it or free from it; that all else in life jars upon you discordantly; that your soul continually dwells with the old masters. You feel that you are surrounded by them. You hear them, see them, converse with them. You are always striving to render music as perfect as the image, or ideal, you have in your mind.

Some dullard might say to you: "Well, professor, that is all in your imagination."

Just so my dear sir. Thoughts are things which become objective to the soul and the soul dwells therein, consequently you dwell within a world of music and scarcely ever leave it; and if any try to lead you forth you become restless and unhappy. You gather about yourself companions like yourself, lovers and thinkers of music. Well, that is a very good heaven to live in.

Thus each soul creates its surroundings. Some are in heaven and some in hell, and many are neither in heaven nor hell, but are halting between the two. One may call it purgatory if one likes. No one need remain in hell a moment longer than one likes. One can think one's self out almost as rapidly as one can think, for as soon as one ceases to create hell it grows dim and vanishes away. The moment one begins to think truth, love, wisdom, beauty, harmony, good works, charity, forgiveness, justice, peace, industry, the doors of heaven open wide before one, and one walks straight through the portals and takes as many along as are ready and willing to go—and it is in this way: As he thinks on Truth, she modestly approaches him and drops jewel after jewel within his soul until at last he has so many that he is filled with knowledge and lives in a world of truth. If he thinks on Love, pure and spotless, love to his brother man and to all souls whatsoever their rank or color, then does he live in a world of truth and love; and thus of wisdom, beauty, harmony, good works, charity, forgiveness, justice, peace, industry. O, what a beautiful heaven is his, how bright, how glorious, how real!

But the reverse of all this is hell, horrible and hateful, filled with agony, torture and thirst. There need be no hells if man willed it otherwise. Why not will it otherwise? If every man on earth willed to be in heaven he would be there in the shortest possible time, and there would be the long talked of millennium right down there on the old earth.

WILLIAM DENTON.

Do Christians Receive What They Ask For?

"Ask and ye shall receive; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you." "He that asketh receiveth; he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened;" and other texts of like import.

In this plain language there is a positive assurance that the Christian shall receive whatever he asks for. It does not say "ye may receive," but "ye shall receive." Consequently true Christians—if there are any such—need not be sick or poor or ignorant or in any way distressed in body or mind. In fact, if Christians receive what they ask for they might easily banish all sin, suffering and wretchedness from the face of the earth. Peace and happiness might reign supreme.

But what do we find, after millions and billions of prayers have been offered by the most devout church members? We find everywhere sin, misery and oppression; even among those who pray regularly. If "the prayers of the righteous availeth much" the world has not yet discovered the fact. To all outward appearance church people are burdened with the many cares of life just as others are, and those that pray oftenest and loudest have no advantage over those that pray least. That Christians do not receive all they ask for is certain; whether they receive anything because of the asking is quite uncertain.

To whom does the Christian pray? He answers, to a personal God. How does he know there is a personal God? Does he know it at all, or does he only suppose there is? If he knows there is such a God he might tell us how he found it out, as many people would be pleased to learn something definite on that important subject.

HEART CRAVINGS.

Won't you give me a nod, my brother,
As you journey along life's road?
It would 'waken anew my courage
And lighten my weary load.

Won't you give me a smile, my brother?
Just the gleam of a kindly eye?
It would make me forget my weakness
And brighten my leaden sky.

Won't you give me a word, my brother?
Just a whisper within my ear?
It would kindle anew my purpose—
Would one little word of cheer.

Won't you give me your hand, my brother?
Let me clasp it before we part?
It would lighten my load of sorrow
And brighten my heavy heart.

The time has come when scientific truth must cease to be the property of the few—when it must be worked into the common life of the world.—Agassiz.

Remarks of the President of the Godless and Devilless Club at Its Last Meeting.

It must be admitted that this life is very delightful, especially in connection with the Godless and Devilless Club, hence it is not at all strange; therefore, that our attention should be concentrated on comforts and luxuries which have a purely physical basis.

The body seems to be the autocrat of the situation. It dominates our thoughts by day, our dreams by night, and our midday fancies. Almost every one in the world gets his living by producing something or inventing something which will prolong our stay here and serve our convenience while we remain.

It is a very absorbing thing to live this present life, and it is rather natural, though not at all prudent or farsighted, that we should be oblivious of any necessity to prepare for the change which we are apt to dread, but which is nevertheless inevitable.

The amount of the aggregate genius which spends its best endeavors to add to the pleasures of the table, to adorn our homes, to increase the security of our finances and so put us beyond the reach of want, shows plainly enough that the intellectual capacities of the race are almost oppressive in their impressiveness. The grandeur of human nature is proved by the way in which the whole earth, its soil, its rivers and oceans, its clouds and its sky, has been forced to contribute to our happiness, our health and our longevity, as well as to our usefulness.

It is a part of our sacred duty to develop the resources of our earthly life, a duty implied by the known plan of Nature and by our manifest destiny. It is a fact that though we began life as mere animals, with all the animal's propensities, we shall in good time, after the necessary struggle and experience, end our career on a level little lower than that of the angels. There is nothing in the universe so suggestive, or so uplifting, or so prophetic as the slow and painful but sure evolution of mankind, because, so far as we know, there is no limit to our possible development, especially to those who belong to the Godless and Devilless Club. Our already achieved victories over natural elements and obstacles point to a coming manhood which cannot be obtained here below and which therefore demands immortality as an inalienable right. There must be somewhere an opportunity to finish our education and to complete the broken columns which are scattered all over the earth, and the Godless and Devilless Club is working along that line.

To make life comfortable, then, is a legitimate part of our duty, but by no means the most important part. When a man sees something ahead of him which can neither be avoided nor ignored it is the business of wisdom to make preparation for it. If he is going to the North Pole he must lay his plans in accordance with that fact, and he would be foolish indeed if he started on the journey with only the clothing fitted for a temperate zone. In like manner, if a man knows that death will transfer him to another life, and that this new life will be spiritual and intellectual rather than physical, he ought to cultivate the intellectual and spiritual so that when the time arrives he will feel at home in the other environment.

If when you step out of your body and relinquish all the enjoyments which pertain to the body you find yourself without those qualities of character which make immortality tolerable you will not only be poor indeed, but you will also be blameworthy. The conditions of the hereafter will be wholly different from those of this life, and therefore, while you value the present for its own sake, you must use it as a means of preparing for the life to come. That statement is based on the requirements of common sense, and on an imperative kind of expediency.

Furthermore, matters have been so ordained that the qualities which will serve you best hereafter will also serve you best here. Let your ambition have its full swing; love the things of this world and work for them. It is quite worth your while to be a factor in the great problems of the present. But beyond all this ambition is character, and that must be kept unsullied. There are no conditions under which its sacrifice can be justified. Character, like refined gold, is current everywhere. It is the only thing which has worth in the spirit realms, to which all the members of the Godless and Devilless Club are going, and it is the best thing on earth. What is good in this world only and must be left at death has its value, but it will not compare with what is good in all worlds.

Even the man Christ bids us live in the full enjoyment of all which time can give us, but to be wise enough to build on that large faith and that moral principle which will make us fearless at sundown and enable us to fall asleep in the glad assurance that in the morning we shall wake in a world which shall not seem strange because we have made ready for it. That foresight and preparation are the essence of true common sense.

It is always safe to be generous in criticism, and seldom safe to be severe. If the just rule, the "measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again," should be literally enforced many a man and woman would be wrecked by the consequences. If it is always possible to say something kind it is well to be in the frame of mind to do it. The middle course is to be silent unless there is a good word to say, and the heroic course is to rebuke the harsh and unnecessary personal criticism.

Many a life has been seriously wounded, many a heart well nigh broken and many a life overshadowed by thoughtless talk which perhaps had no foundation in fact, or was based on facts misunderstood. It is so much better to be sweet than sour, as is well known by all our members. The juicy plum filled with sunshine hangs on the branches in abundance, and so does the lemon, and it is a more gracious taste which chooses the plum and leaves the lemon for others to pluck. Life contains so many disagreeable things that if we can avoid coming into contact with any one of them we do ourselves a distinct benefit. A smile helps the world more than a frown, and the good nature which ignores the unpleasant and dwells only on the agreeable is a sublime virtue which is as charming as it is rare.

The clear injunction of the religion of nature is to find the good in our neighbors and not to magnify their failings. We may laugh at their follies or look with scorn on their weaknesses, but who knows what we ourselves would do under like circumstances? We are not so weak that we will thank a God, of whom we know absolutely nothing, as the poor Pharisee did, that we are not like other men. If we are really strong the best way to show our strength is to help those who have fallen by the way rather than spread the news of their failure, as though we stood on a higher and safer level. This is the course the Godless and Devilless Club has pursued from the start.

A legend is told of the young man Jesus which illustrates my point. He was standing in a group who were looking at a dead dog. Each spectator had something hard and cruel on his lips, but at last a gentle voice was heard, saying, "He had very white teeth!" It was perhaps the only thing that could be said of a favorable nature, and it was the only thing he cared to say. It was a rebuke not to be easily forgotten, and the men in the group silently stole away, wondering at themselves and at him.

You deceive yourself if you think you are good and still indulge in uncharity. I would rather be poor Abou Ben Adhem, who cared nothing for any of the supposed holy beings, but wanted to be classed as one "who loves his fellow men," than so wretched a Christian that he could cherish a secret delight in the faults of others. Common sense religion, such as is possessed by the members of the Godless and Devilless Club, is either the most practical and useful thing in the world, or it counts for nothing—the theory of a day, to be abandoned on the morrow. And it proves its mettle when it demands a generous and charitable judgment and will accept no excuse if you have it not. There never yet was human soul so debased that the angels cannot sometime kindle a divine and purging flame in it. In the basest creature that lives there are possibilities of excellence which cannot be calculated, and your word of censure, your scorn and disdain, your repetition of an evil rumor may quench that flame in its feeble beginnings.

There is but one wholesome rule to follow. It is the dictate of honor and of the consciousness that even you need to be judged kindly. It is never to spread an injurious story, for your own sake, for his sake, for the sake of all concerned. No bitterness of spirit and no bitterness of criticism. Look for the good and speak of it freely, but be blind to the faults of others as you would have them blind to yours.

This address, so far as given to the Godless and Devilless Club, emanates mostly from that master mind, Geo. H. Hepworth, one of the great lights of the New York Herald. Your President has remodeled it, improved it and thus adapted it to the imperative needs of this Club. The word "religion" was changed to a more sanitary word, and thus burnished and otherwise greatly improved it became no obstacle in the way while moving along the lines of least resistance to the higher spheres.

Mortals, through their superlative ignorance, become God-makers. One of the members of the Club had drawn a conception of Gods as formulated formerly by the Hawaiians:

Fifty years ago the Hawaiians generally worshiped idols. Among the most popular were the war gods, whose images were made of the feathers of rare birds. Nothing was spared to embellish them, and more particularly to give them a real aspect. Human hair was sometimes fixed on their heads, but more often they were provided with huge crested helmets, which recall those of the Greeks. Dogs' teeth were inserted in their mouths, mother-of-pearl was used for eyes, and the pupils were made of buttons of black wood.

If anything in the nature of things be sacrilegious, it must be connected with the grotesque and highly imaginative conceptions of a God by superlatively ignorant and superstitious mortals—and who is not more or less ignorant and superstitious on this material plane? There is a veil between man and the spirit world—a veil between him and his spirit friends, and a much thicker one between him and the origin of all things. Hence, in many respects one has to guess, to conjecture, to imagine what lies beyond. This veil that obscures the vision has resulted in the formation of thousands of different Gods—no two of whom exactly resemble each other, and the outcome of all this is truly pitiable, there springing therefrom a mountain of superstition and pernicious practices that dwarfs human nature. As stated by one of the members of the Godless and Devilless Club, there was found recently in Madras a relic that is accepted by experts as the most authentic remnant of Buddha now extant. It is a small flake of bone about the size of a finger nail, probably from the head of the femur of Gautama, and about as worthless as a dead monkey, reptile, or rat. It was discovered in a great granite ball ten feet in circumference, which bore an inscription in Asokan characters, and which fell apart upon the application of pressure. In the center was a small box of white crystal containing the relic. The inscription and other data show that the bone was sealed up in this way 250 years before Christ by persons who believed in its authenticity. It is contemporaneous with the earliest known records of Buddhism, dating to within 150 years of Buddha's death, which state that by the Master's own wish parts of his body were distributed among the faithful after his death.

Whether authentic or not, this bit of bone has, of course, a priceless value in the eyes of true Buddhists, who are in many respects densely ignorant. The Governor of Madras at first offered to give it to the King of Siam, but the British imperial authorities now are inclined to hold it for other purposes. A writer in the Nineteenth Century makes the ingenious proposition that it be utilized to open a way into the Forbidden Land of Thibet. The Grand Lama at Lassa is the head of the whole Buddhist hierarchy. The group of powerful lamas who control him and who have been successful in preventing all Europeans from setting foot in the Forbidden City doubtless would be willing to make almost any concessions to secure the precious relic—precious, because the quintessence of superstition and ignorance has made it so. A remnant of a bone of Buddha will seem as desirable to them as a piece of the true cross would have seemed to a Christian Prince a thousand years ago.

It is not impossible that Thibet might be induced by this means to transfer its nominal allegiance to Great Britain. For more than ten years it has ceased to recognize China as its suzerain. During the past summer the Buddhists of Thibet broke all precedents by sending a mission to St. Petersburg, apparently with the sanction of the Grand Lama. It is inevitable that the hermit exclusiveness of Thibet soon must end, either peaceably or by force. Then the country probably will fall under the control either of Russia or of Great Britain. The delegation of Lamas sent to St. Petersburg may indicate a leaning toward Russia. Possibly the relic of Buddha might sway the powers at Lassa in the other direction and add another province to the domains of the Emperor of India. Stranger things than that have happened.

Thus one can realize what consummate ignorance and superstition can do with a small flake of bone—mold the destiny of a nation! The necessity for the existence of the Godless and Devilless Club becomes more apparent every day; and the interest is increasing all the time.

Every day demonstrates the necessity for the existence of this Godless and Devilless Club, formed exclusively on humanitarian lines. The fact that the President adapted one of Mr. Hepworth's sermons to meet the requirements of the Club was received with great favor and much good-natured merriment.

Remarkable Address by Dr. Oliver Lodge.

ENGLISH SCIENTIST SAYS IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO DENY THE PROBABILITY OF THERE BEING IN SPACE AN IMMENSE RANGE OF LIFE AND INTELLIGENCE OF WHICH WE AT PRESENT KNOW NOTHING—THE EVIDENCE.

London, Feb. 1.—The attitude of scientific men toward the phenomena of telepathy, trance and clairvoyance has been so uncompromisingly skeptical that Sir William Crookes' sympathetic discussion of the subject two years ago aroused the greatest popular interest. Now comes a no less eminent investigator, Dr. Oliver Lodge, who, as President of the Society of Psychical Research, delivered yesterday a remarkable address. He made statements which, a generation ago, would have been startling in the mouth of a scientific man, and his audience, including many eminent men, listened and applauded some far-reaching conclusions.

He did not hesitate to declare as an undoubted fact that under certain conditions the mouth can speak and the hand can write concerning things wholly outside of the normal ken of the mind usually concerning them. Telepathy is the one ultra-normal human faculty, the reality of which every one who has engaged in researches is prepared to assent to—that is, assent to as a bare fact, a summary of certain observed phenomena. But its laws are unknown and its scope and meaning not yet apparent. It is probably but one of a whole chapter of scientifically unrecorded but recognized human faculties. It might turn out to be a mistake to attempt to employ it for the purpose of explaining a great number of other powers which might be coextensive or equi-potent with itself, though the attempt would be a natural and proper one to make.

For a time, however, telepathy itself stood in need of explanation. In a general hypothesis which sought to explain the control of a medium's body in trance by the agency of discarnate spirits, it was to be presumed that an elaborate machine like our bodies was capable of being occasionally used, not only by the mind or intelligence which manufactured it, so to speak, but temporarily and with difficulty by other minds or intelligences permitted to make use of it. The main assumption here was that such other intelligences existed, but that he confessed was to him a not very improbable assumption.

Knowing what we already certainly know of the material universe and of its immense scope and the number of habitable worlds it contained—he would not say inhabited, for evidence did not yet reveal that—but habitable worlds, and perceiving also the immense variety of life which luxuriated everywhere on this planet wherever conditions permitted, he found it impossible to deny the probability that there might be in space an immense range of life and intelligence of which we at present know nothing.

Science has a horror of the unintelligible. It could make nothing of a capricious and disorderly agent and it preferred to ignore the existence of such.

The greater number of psychical phenomena asserted to take place in the presence of a medium involved nothing in themselves extraordinary, but there was another class of phenomena not sharply distinguished from the former set, which involved an effect beyond ordinary human power to accomplish—for instance, the asserted resistance of the human skin and nerves to fire when under religious emotion or in some trance state; or the extraction of a solid object from a permanently closed box; or, what was much more commonly asserted, the materialization or apparition of temporary human forms. He had never seen any of these things under satisfactory conditions, but the evidence adduced by Sir William Crookes and others was extremely detailed and it was almost as difficult to resist their testimony as it was to accept the things they testified to.

If he were asked did he associate physical movements and other physical phenomena with the continued existence of deceased persons he must answer that he did not. But—eliminating physical phenomena—suppose he was asked further did he consider that trance utterances were ever due to the agencies of departed persons, he was bound to say that as regarded the contents or intelligence of the message it did sometimes very strongly indicate some form of access to a persistent portion of a departed personality and occasionally thoroughly suggested its actual agency. By agency he meant something more like dream intelligence or a sub-conscious part of the persistent mind and not a conscious part.

Asked if he believed in ghosts, Dr. Lodge replied:

"No. I have seen too many of them."

Ghostly Sights Are Seen.

Startling figures and forms, flaming swords, and pillars of fire are the visible manifestations of some occult or other agency which has convinced the most conservative inhabitants of the village of Richview, a few miles south of Centralia, Ill., that ghosts do exist after all.

The family of Beman Edwards formerly scoffed at the suggestion of such a thing as ghosts, but when their little one-story home became the center of popular excitement, and the most practical efforts failed to explode superstitious theories, they reluctantly admitted a theory they were unable to fathom.

The trouble began one night two weeks ago, while Edwards was engrossed in a book and his wife was playing a guitar. Suddenly she became aware of a yellow light in front of her that strayed about the room, assumed the form of a gigantic sword, passed three times under her husband's chair, and then disappeared. The second evening after this Edwards saw the same vision as he started to leave his home to go to the village store for a few minutes. The great sword of fire passed across the road in front of him, then vanished.

Other ghostly manifestations have been seen by the Edwards family and their neighbors. Thomas Martin and his wife, who live next door, allege to have seen the figure of a man emerge through the outer door of the house, inch by inch. Mrs. Edwards has seen strange faces peering at her from her windows and doorways. A pillar of fire has appeared to her more than once. The Edwards home is known as the "haunted house," and the family is preparing to move.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

HAUNTED HOUSE

In Which a Prominent Character Lived.

On the eve of marriage to a beautiful woman, Miss Nina Poore, the duke of Hamilton, Scotland's premier peer of the rank, fancies that he is relentlessly pursued by the ghost of an Egyptian princess. The thirteenth of his line—an unlucky number, according to popular superstition—the duke has more titles than he knows what to do with, for his ancestors were distinguished figures in the national life of Great Britain and won honors from their sovereigns that were desired by many of their compatriots, but secured by none.

But with all the titles he bears the present duke of Hamilton has not had an altogether pleasant life. Misfortunes without number have pursued and overtaken him, and the superstitious shake their heads and predict for him a dreadful fate, for is he not the thirteenth of his line? So, when his forthcoming marriage was announced it brought little joy to those attached to his household or honored with his friendship. They saw in the event only a fresh opportunity for a cruel fate to afflict him and bring disaster upon his noble name and house.

LIVES IN GRAND RAPIDS.

Hamilton place, in which the duke resides, is a habitation fit for a king. But magnificent though it is he takes little enjoyment while there, for he is heavily in debt for all it contains and his creditors are constantly besieging him for payment. All the property which he nominally owns is encumbered for more than it is worth, and strive as he may the young nobleman cannot extricate himself from the grasp of the money lenders. His estate brings in no income, but is a constant drain upon his resources and expectations. His poverty threatens his social prestige, as a British nobleman who takes advantage of the bankrupt courts is ostracized by his fellows and by royalty.

THE GHOST APPEARS.

Much of the present duke's embarrassment is due to the injudicious conduct of one of his progenitors. In lieu of keeping up a semi-royal state the tenth duke raised the immense pile of Hamilton palace, erected a chateau overlooking the park to gratify the whim of a fair lady and lived so far as wealth could command the life of a prince. But for him even this display of outward show did not suffice. At the cost of $1,000,000 he built a mausoleum in Hamilton park and in silver coffins reinterred the remains of all the previous dukes, reserving for himself a sarcophagus from which he had ungallantly ejected the mummy of a daughter of one of the Pharaohs. The mummy may be seen within a glass case in the palace, but therein lies a story.

This tenth duke had not long been placed in his usurped casket before rumor had it that the mausoleum was haunted. At first, it seems, it was not very clear what was amiss, except that the massive sarcophagus was by some inexplicable agency moved, only an inch or two, it is true, but moved nevertheless from the exact spot on which it had been placed. It was returned to the spot on which it had first stood, only to be moved in the same manner again. The keeper was discharged and a new one appointed, but still the sarcophagus could not be kept on that particular spot, at least so it is asserted.

But another manifestation was not long in forthcoming. Shortly before the death of the eleventh duke the keeper of the mausoleum of that time entered the building late one afternoon and beheld a curiously robed female figure bending over the sarcophagus.

The figure, the keeper declared, turned toward him with a look of distress on a very beautiful face and vanished. Again before the death of the twelfth duke it is said a figure similarly attired was seen to issue from the closed doors of the mausoleum and walk slowly up the broad avenue leading to the palace.—Chicago Chronicle.

AFRICAN GHOST STORY.

Apparitions Seen at Cape Town.

I have just arrived in England from Cape Town, and during my stay there I heard a curious ghost story, which was, and still is, causing considerable sensation in the place. The general postoffice, a fine four-storied building in Adderly street, the principal thoroughfare, is haunted by a genuine spook. Most people would consider that South Africa is too modern and go-ahead a locality for such old-fashioned visitations, but the following is the story, told by one of the telephone operators, a member of the Cape civil service:

One night, about the end of October last, he was sitting in front of his switchboard—the time was near midnight, and very few calls were being made at that hour—when he was suddenly aroused by a knock. Receiving no answer to his inquiry of "Who's there?" he looked around, and, to his astonishment, saw a strange figure bobbing up and down on the other side of the glass partition which separated his room from another. At first he fancied he was dreaming, but on rubbing his eyes and looking again he perceived that the figure possessed the head and body of a man, but the lower limbs were lost in a sort of mist. The eyes were terrible to behold, and seemed to blaze with red and green fire.

At first the clerk was naturally very much alarmed, but he soon screwed up enough courage to accost the specter with the first words that came into his head, which happened to be, "What, ho!" The ghost did not deign to reply, but, gliding through the locked partition, advanced toward the terrified man and then halted. In sepulchral tones it now addressed him with these words: "I want X——" (mentioning the name of one of the clerks in the department). The man was speechless, whereupon the apparition, seemingly displeased at his silence, glided nearer and glared angrily at him. A few minutes later the night watchman, going his round below, met a shivering individual with his hair literally on end with fright, and with difficulty recognized him as B——, the telephone clerk. B——'s story was entirely disbelieved by the watchman, but to reassure him, and out of pity for his fearful state of mind, he went up with him to search for the specter. Nothing, however, was to be seen.

The next night the same thing happened, and this time the clerk fled in terror from the building. On the third night he refused to go on duty without a companion. This was granted him, and the two went on together. Again the specter appeared, repeating the former request. One of the clerks thereupon seized a ruler and made a frontal attack upon the supernatural visitor, but it immediately melted away through the glass partition and disappeared.

A week later, about nine o'clock in the evening, a watchman on the first floor saw a headless man walking about. He gave chase, but it vanished as the other had done. On another occasion at midnight a watchman declares that he distinctly saw a man dressed in khaki sitting at one of the office tables. He spoke to him and asked what he was doing there. The man thereupon faded away as mysteriously as the others. A great many queer noises and rappings are continually being heard, causing men to fight shy of night duty in the postoffice, even at the risk of losing their appointments.

A member of the Psychical Research Society was taken through the building. He heard the noises, and said he would interview the spirit or spirits. He changed his mind, however, the reason he gave being that it was a very angry and dangerous spirit, which he would not care to meet. His opinion did not succeed in consoling the night staff, who declare it is the ghost of a man who was killed during the construction of the telephone department. On the day I left Cape Town a thorough examination of the postoffice was contemplated.—Cor. London Graphic.

Declares the Bible Teaches Reincarnation.

The beliefs and practices sanctioned and promulgated by the so-called followers of the meek and lowly Jesus are supposed to be based upon the King James version of the Hebrew scriptures, and especially upon the teachings of Jesus Christ in the four gospels and in the Epistles of Paul and other apostles.

It is rather curious to notice how widely the practices and belief of the majority of these people diverge from the instruction given by the peerless Jesus, who explicitly taught among other things that long prayers in public places should be avoided. Listen to the following: "And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as hypocrites are, for they love to pray standing in the synagogues * * * Use not vain repetitions as the heathen do, for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking."

He then gave them a form of prayer containing sixty-six words and told them to do their praying in secret, and even in the Old Testament the people are cautioned to "let their words be few" in uttering anything before God.

Another theory plainly taught throughout the Bible, which is totally ignored or rejected by Christian theology, is that of the rebirth of the souls of mankind into new physical bodies. Jesus plainly told His disciples that John the Baptist was Elijah that had been foretold to come again. In other words, that the soul of Elijah had been reborn as John the Baptist. This is reincarnation pure and simple.

It was prophesied by Malachi, "Behold, I will send you the prophet Elijah before the great and dreadful day of the Lord." * * * The angel said to Zacharias that John should go forth in the spirit and power of Elias. Then Jesus said, in speaking of John, "If ye will receive it, this is Elias that was for to come," and in another place, "Elias has come already," and the proof is conclusive. We must either reject the testimony of Jesus or accept the fact of reincarnation.

The theosophical teaching is that such rebirth take place after an interval of a thousand or fifteen hundred years. This corresponds closely to the period of time between Elijah and John the Baptist, which was a little less than a thousand years.

A great similarity may be traced between these two personalities. Elijah was a stern ascetic; so was John. Elijah was a hairy man, girt with a girdle of leather about his loins; John had raiment of camel's hair, with a leather girdle about his loins.

Nor is this all. We read that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Let us trace the working out of this law in the history of the soul we are studying.

As Elijah, he slew the prophets of Baal by the brook of Kishon. At another time he caused the death of two companies of soldiers, numbering in all 102 men, by the exercise of occult powers. As John the Baptist he reaped the fruit of such sowing by meeting with a violent death at the hands of Herod.

John does not seem to have remembered his former incarnation and denied that he was Elijah. Indeed, it is rarely the case that the memory of the soul is impressed upon the ordinary brain consciousness. In fact, we remember comparatively few of the transactions of our present lives. If we lived to be fifteen hundred years old we would remember perhaps nothing at all of a great portion of the time. With the break of consciousness that comes with the death of the old body and birth into the new, the complete loss of memory is to be expected.

The Christian clergy have been for centuries so deeply engaged in promulgating the letter of the word that they have lost sight of much of its spirit and truth.—Ransom H. Randall in Chicago Record-Herald.

The Indians Must Vote.

It seems that there is a tribe of Onondaga Indians in New York state who have not yet been made voters. How they have escaped is a miracle, but now they announce that they are ready to sever their tribal relations, and their petition says: "We ask the Government to grant us the right to cast our ballots as free-born American citizens."

By all means grant them the right. They are the only men in the state, outside the penitentiary and the insane asylums, who are deprived of the franchise. But let every barrier be strengthened against granting this same right to the women of New York, who, in wealth, education, ability and character are not surpassed by any in the world.—Ida Husted Harper in New York Sun.

CORAZONADA.

(Cry of the Heart.)

I drew a bright picture, in life's early morn
Of manhood resplendent and grand,
Of fair bride and children, my home to adorn,
Of fame and achievements heroical born,
Of honors supreme in the land.

And sometimes I would ride with the mythical queen,
In her chariot drawn only by doves,
The circuit of life; in a rapture serene,
By man's frail ambitions unheard and unseen,
Apart from the earth's baser loves.

But where are the hopes that in youth's radiant days
Clothed earth in a lustre of gold?
And where the sweet songs and the mythical lays,
The mellow refrains of devotion and praise,
The raptures that boyhood enfold?

They have vanished like clouds on the mountains afar,
Like snowflakes that fall on the sea,
Like the shadows that leap over wild Loch Nagar,
Like the trace of the lightning, the skies' errant star,
And left but remembrance for me.

I have seen the full moon as she glided on high,
The stars with her splendor enshroud,
And again I have seen her, low down in the sky,
No longer a globe, that with sunshine could vie;
But a crescent with meekness endowed.

And such I now feel is the fortune of man,
And such his terrestrial fate,
In glow and in glamor he reaches the van,
But to glide away down where the contest began,
Naught earthly's enduring and great.

As lambkins that pine in the corral or fold,
As birdlings restrained in their flight,
As rootlets that move in the spring's melting mould,
As manacled crew in the ship's prison hold,
We're sighing for freedom and light.

I have borne the pale forms of loved children and wife
Away to the earth's chilly bed.
Dark mourning and agony entered my life,
I shunned the cursed world, its allurements and strife,
And prayed to lie down with my dead.

The sand dunes have chased from the rivulet's bed
The waters by spring-time supplied,
From the purple-topped hills all the cloudlets have fled,
And only the light that is garish and red,
Flashes down over hamlet and tide.

And yet do I shrink from a couch in the glade,
Or seek in its umbrage a rest.
Can the grave furish shelter, concealment and shade
For sins I would hide, or for duties delayed,
And soothe the heart cries of the breast?

When the sun is eclipsed by the hurricane's shroud,
And forest kings topple and reel,
Omnipotence speaks in his grandeur aloud,
Saying, "Listen, poor mortals, ungrateful and proud,
And your lips in humility seal.

"Your deeds are but foam on the ocean of time,
They are dust in the desert of care,
And bubbles, the words you have counted sublime,
Your poetry naught but the clatter of rhyme,
Your heart cries are throbs of the air."

Can there be a just God who with prodigal hand
Sows this anguish and sorrow and night?
I would lean on a force that is genial and bland
Like the sun-dial's gnomon, that, moved by its sand,
Points only to hours that are bright.

In the grave of lost hopes, let me bury the past,
And cease o'er life's failures to sigh;
Regrets unavailing aside I would cast,
With no corazonada to burden the blast,
Lie down in contentment to die.

Sing again the sweet songs that together we sang
In life's morning march by the sea,
When the hills echoed back as our laughter shouts rang,
And heart cries bore naught of a sorrowful pang,
But joined with bird tones in the glee.

I'm sad; but I grieve not for days that have fled,
Make my couch in the rose garden dear;
Bring sweetest carnations above me to spread,
On hyacinth blooms rest my gray, weary head,
And wood songsters' notes let me hear.

But pause; see yon headlands of emerald green,
Just beyond the wild breakers' foam,
And lo! the high pharos majestic, serene,
There's a pilot to guide, there's a harbor to screen,
And a royal love welcome—at home.

J. CLEMENT SMITH.

Funeral Service at Salt Lake City, Utah.

A funeral without sobs, emblems of mourning or lamentation for the dead; a funeral sermon delivered by one who had already passed from earth to the Great Beyond; a funeral at which all present believed the spirit of him they had met to honor was hovering over them—such were the obsequies of little Haward Johnson, aged 4 years, 3 months and 21 days, who was buried yesterday afternoon from the rooms of Mrs. Fontyn on West Temple street.

The parents of the dead child are believers in Spiritualism, and the funeral ceremonies were conducted according to the rites of that faith. Some thirty people, men, women and children, were gathered in a little room about a small white coffin containing the mortal remains of little Haward. Near the casket were fresh and fragrant cut flowers, almost the only symbols recognized by the Spiritualists and regarded by them as by other sects as the emblems of immortality.

For many minutes the group about the little white coffin sat silent and thoughtful. Then two ladies moved to the organ and as one fingered the keys the other sang in tremulous tones, "Abide With Me." When the strains of music died away, Mrs. Fontyn, the acknowledged leader of the Spiritualists in this city, arose from her chair. Her eyes were closed, and almost from the first word spoken the gathering understood that she was speaking for another. It proved that she was acting as a medium for the guardian spirit of the dead boy. Funeral sermons from the spirit land do not differ greatly from those of terrestrial ministers. The spirit who was officiating on this occasion recalled the time when he had christened the dead child and given him a flower from the fields of Paradise. He assured the parents that the little soul would be with them forever and ever and was now in a position to do more for them than he would ever have done on this side of the veil. His death, explained the spiritual visitant, had occurred because his mission on earth was completed. The parents were assured that in time the little fellow's spirit would be permitted to revisit them. Several times the officiating spirit explained that his medium was so afflicted with sorrow that he could not speak at length.

At the conclusion of the sermon the medium, with eyes still closed, grasped the hand of the bereaved mother and comforted her in behalf of the controlling spirit.

Again deep silence brooded over the gathering, which was broken by the president of the society, who arose with closed eyes and spoke on the future life of the dead boy. She said that even then his spirit was beside his parents and would remain near them. Whether she was speaking for herself or under inspiration from the spirit world, was not altogether clear.

Mr. Ronalds, the oldest gentleman medium of the society, arose and said: "I am glad to be here," an expression which sounded rather startling to one unaccustomed to the teachings of the Spiritualists, but which appeared reasonable enough when he told of the enviable lot of those who were called from earth after fulfilling their missions. He congratulated the parents that they no longer believed the old doctrine that the dead remained dead for a thousand years, but knew that their darling was alive and well beyond the veil.

"Nearer, My God, to Thee" was sung with the organ accompaniment and the meeting was quietly dismissed. The little coffin was placed in a white hearse by Funeral Director O'Donnell and taken to the cemetery.

Spiritualistic funerals are more common now than they were a few years ago, but still they do not occur with much frequency in this city. That yesterday was the first for several months. The faith of the people in their creed is certainly shown by the calmness with which they are able to regard the death of their loved ones.—Salt Lake (Utah) paper.

POEMS FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

Asphodel Blooms and Other Offerings.

Many of the poets of to-day strain their wits to give us in rhythmic form vague, fantastic, crude imitations of such masters of poetic art as Browning, Tennyson, Emerson, Kipling, etc., imitations which jingle all right but which hold no definite meaning and supply no inspiration to conduct or character to the minds which need most such meaning and inspiration for help in daily living, the countless men, women and children who find their happiness in the common happenings of their daily home life.

It is refreshing therefore to find a book of poetry mainly devoted to such themes as come within the range of a varied household, home-like little incidents put into lilting or pensive verse likely to live in memory, into which is woven inspiring thought, awakening life lessons of love, hope, charity and beauty. Such a household book of poems we find in "Asphodel Blooms and Other Offerings," by Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle, of Berlin Heights, Ohio. It is a handsomely bound large volume of 285 pages, and within its covers may be found poems relating to fathers, mothers, grandparents and children of all ages, with many verses fitted for song and recitations.

As the author has been for many years a prominent member of the American Humane Education Society, and the originator of the oratorical prize contest plan for its advancement, a number of poems pay tribute to the sterling virtues and sensitive feelings of the animal race, such as "My Friend, the Saint Bernard," "Blind and Dumb," "The Pet of the Flock," etc. Nature's lessons in all seasons, and the various anniversaries which bring families and their friends together are delightfully depicted in rhythmic lines.

There is much that is quotable, but space will permit only a few specimens taken at random. In a poem addressed to women, entitled "Fraternity," occurs the following:

"The grandeur and strength of nations
Lies in the mothers of men,
And the souls of a country's mothers
Are stronger than sword or pen.
O, a love for broad-browed Justice,
Is the root of the noblest lives,
For justice is more than mercy,
And on it all virtue thrives."

"The Patchwork Quilt" of which she sings, is getting out of date in these days of "ready made," but there are still many who will understand all the last verse indicates:

"Now fold the bed quilt neatly,
Its patches tell so much,
As memory's flying fingers
The chords of feeling touch,
And send my longings forward
Into the great unknown,
Where up the hills of Progress
My old-time friends have gone."

"Heartbreak Hill" is a pathetic poem full of truths to be recognized by everybody, one verse of which runs thus:

"But on they go in an endless throng,
With dance or dirge for a marching song,
The good and the bad, the weak and the strong—
All dizzy-headed and going wrong!
Winding onward to meet their fate,
The known and the unknown, small and great,
The woe-begone and the desolate
Pushing forward with blinded will,
Up Heartbreak Hill."

A number of short stories and rhymes by Clair Tuttle, a daughter of the author, are given and add to the attractiveness of this volume, which is handsomely bound in blue and silver, and contains several full-page illustrations. The leading title, "Asphodel Blooms," refers to the many poems of the higher life interspersed amid the more numerous home life inspirations.

A WONDERFUL SHRUB—CURES

KIDNEY AND BLADDER

Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

Rev. A. C. Darling, Minister of the Gospel, under date of May 20th, writes from his home at North Constantin, Oswego county, New York:

I have been troubled with Kidney and kindred diseases for 16 years, and tried all I could get without relief. Two and a half years ago I was taken with a severe attack of La Grippe, which turned to pneumonia. At that time my Liver, Kidneys, Heart and Urinary Organs all combined in what to me seemed their last attack. My confidence in man and medicine had gone. My hope had vanished, and all that was left me was a dreary life and certain death. At last I heard of Alkavis, and as a last resort I commenced taking it. At that time I was using the vessel as often as sixteen times in one night, without sleep or rest. In a short time to my astonishment, I could sleep all night as soundly as a baby, which I had not done in sixteen years before. What I know it has done for me I firmly believe it will do for all who will give Alkavis a fair trial. I most gladly recommend Alkavis to all.

Sincerely yours,
(Rev.) A. C. DARLING

The venerable Mr. Joseph W. Whitten, of Wolfboro, N. H., at eighty-five years of age, also testifies to the powers of Alkavis in curing severe Kidney and Bladder Disorders, Dropsy and Rheumatism. Hundreds of others give similar testimony. Many ladies also join in testifying to the wonderful curative powers of Alkavis in Kidney and allied diseases, and other troublesome afflictions peculiar to womanhood, which cannot with propriety be described here.

That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by mail Free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others. It is a Sure Specific Cure and can not fail. Address, The Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 401 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

Spiritualism Not Superstition.

Walter C. Knowlton, of Gardner, Mass., takes exception in the Truth Seeker, to remarks of Hugh O. Pentecost in a public lecture, entitled "Persistence of Superstition," wherein he classed Spiritualists with the superstitious. Mr. Knowlton replies in substance as follows:

"A true Spiritualist has no belief to teach unless it can be proved by substantial facts. He KNOWS that all nature is governed by inexorable law. There are many kinds of phenomena passing before his eyes that the most learned cannot explain. We should not be called superstitious for believing trees grow, though ignorant of the law which forms cells.

"That the so-called spirit world impinges on the physical, and that there is intelligent communication between the two, cannot be successfully disproved. The phenomena of Spiritualism is as much subject to natural law as was Newton's apple to the law of gravity.

"Instead of being a new form of superstition Spiritualism has done more to expose the ignorant superstitions, and false doctrines of the past than all other agents combined. The writer was rescued from the errors of orthodoxy by the light of Spiritualism.

"There is no class fighting with greater zeal for complete religious and medical liberty than Spiritualists. Don't throw mud at them. They will stand shoulder to shoulder with all Liberals in fighting the common enemy."

All Babies to Go to Heaven.

Rejoice, good mothers, for everlasting joys await your dead babies! For several centuries Presbyterians have taught that only elect babies were saved; that the rest were damned; that "hell is paved with infants not a span long." Preachers who taught to the contrary were not orthodox. They were heretics, and as such were expelled from the church, and esteemed fit subjects for outer darkness. The church became terribly agitated because of the growing hatred of that cursed Westminster creed. Presbyters and Synods took up the subject; finally the report comes that the General Synod in Convention at Philadelphia, through their committee on revision of its creed, determined to save the last one of the babies, and have so reported, with the understanding that the report will be adopted.

Another period will pass—churchmen are slow in thought—then the fires of hell will be extinguished; the devil will prove to be the chimera of a lunatic; and a virgin-born god will take his departure with Bacchus, Adonis and other myths, then Infinite Intelligence will reign supreme. Time, hasten the day when Truth shall be victor.

Our Religion Not in Demand.

Rev. Geo. Whitfield Stone can't be orthodox. In his thanksgiving sermon he said:

"The news bulletins bring us word that our merchandise and manufactured goods find ready markets all over the earth. Even those the missionaries describe as "heathen" purchase our oils, muslins and machinery. They prefer these to our religion. They pay for our merchandise, but won't accept our religion as a gift. The commercial traveler can convert them to our views of what is comfortable, convenient, and useful much easier than our theological travelers can convince them that all their ancestors, whom as a rule they worship, were totally depraved and knew nothing of the principles of religion."

That preacher is doing some thinking along new lines. If Spiritualism could be taught among those heathen, and they could be assured their ancestors still live, and will while eternity endures, and that no torture will be inflicted on the disrobed spirits, and that Infinite Intelligence has never produced a son by mortal maiden who has died on a cross, then is it not probable they would look upon our religion with respect? But never while it antagonizes common sense.

More Pay and Better Clothes.

Now the Chaplains in the United States Navy are at the front. They want more pay and a better coat. They have tired of "the single-breasted, shad-bellied, long-tailed frock coat, such as is worn by the clergy in some foreign countries, but simply looks ridiculous." A seamless tunic without sleeves, with possibly sandals on the feet, in addition, such as the Master is said to have worn when traveling without staff or scrip in propagation of his faith, would be pronounced quite out of fashion by his modern disciples.

A Ghastly Religion.

At Sparta, Tenn., only a few days ago, Mrs. Eula Abbey, the wife of a young merchant, who "got religion" in the full, obeyed the injunctions of the Master by pulling out one of her eyes which offended her. Mutilation of members seems a poor way to fit a person for immortal joys, even if Jesus did teach it.

Was It an Accident?

Soon after Lord Kelvin had assisted in laying the Atlantic cable, when he was yet known as Sir William Thompson, his mind was greatly troubled in devising some method for perfecting the ordinary telegraphic apparatus used on overhead wires, as the old method, or the one then in vogue, was not suited for the varying currents passing along the cables.

The laying of the electric current had the effect of making them run together in one bottom current, with surface ripples. The difficulty which Lord Kelvin had to overcome was to invent a means of clearly distinguishing all the delicate fluctuations.

One day the great inventor's eyeglass dropped off and swung in front of the magnet. The glass deflected its movements, and from this simple and unexpected incident the "mirror instrument" was invented.—Ex.

Such cases as the above are classed as accidents. Are they such in fact? A history of many great inventions shows that the discovery of the principles involved in them was owing to some fortuitous circumstance, or accidental arrangement of parts in which the reasoning mind of the inventor did not participate. Such was the case with the telescope. Often a person becomes perplexed in trying to solve some difficult problem, when on awakening from sleep the solution comes "pop into the mind," as Thomas Paine said his best thoughts came.

If we had the ability to fathom the sources of thought, and the impelling motor in a class of accidents leading to magnificent results, is it not possible unseen intelligences have more to do with them than we are accustomed to give them credit? Many a seeming ruinous mishap has culminated in the greatest good to the supposed unfortunates! It has been the custom to credit these gratifying results to the kindly overruling of Providence; but is it not possible loved ones who have preceded us to spirit life have been the real actors, employing such instrumentalities as they could bring into service. If they can ring bells, make clocks strike, slip solid steel rings on an arm, or encircle a neck, pass matter through solid substances, as is often alleged, then is it not possible they are often responsible for many other inexplicable operations our philosophy cannot expound?

A Christian's Reflection on War.

The horrors of war are best known to those who have witnessed its awful ravages, and felt its blighting effects. Our friend, James Christian, Esq., a practicing attorney-at-law before the Rebellion, at Lawrence, Kansas, held a Captain's commission in that war, and was Commissary of Subsistence for the 3d division, 7th army corps, in command of Maj. Gen. Solomon, of Wisconsin. He kept a daily diary of events coming under his observation, and this has just fallen into our possession, though Mr. Christian is long since dead. After describing a battle scene, quite too graphic for these semi-peaceful times, with the constant bearing away of the wounded, amid moans and lamentations, he says:

"It is a heart-rending sight to see hundreds, sometimes thousands of men lying on the ground, wounded in all manner of ways, some dead, others dying, the survivors crippled for life, a burden to themselves and friends the balance of their days. The pure cussedness and bull-headedness of a few would-be leaders who refuse to listen to the voice of reason or humanity, aggravate the evil.

"A fearful responsibility rests on those who involve a nation in war. One side is always in the wrong; sometimes both. Occasionally a battle is fought on an open plain, both lines in full view of each other. Being somewhat of an outsider during a battle, having nothing to do but look on and think—for we issue no rations during a battle—I have often thought what a farce is our religion! [Mr. Christian was orthodox.]

"I have often heard the chaplain tell how precious is a human soul; that it is worth a thousand worlds, yet at the same time they countenance war and bloodshed. I have seen those we classed as good religious men at home, when our terrible shells burst in the midst of the enemy, scattering their ranks and flinging scores of fellow men bearing the image of God into eternity, cheer and shout with glee. And when the enemy hurls one of those sulphurous instruments of hell into our ranks, then they in turn raise a howl of joy as heads, legs and arms fly in all directions. Each party claims to be Christian, yet three-fourths of those who die in battle, die with blasphemy on their lips, crying 'give them hell, boys,' or some similar expression. Gen. W. T. Sherman gave war its proper name: 'Butchery!'"

Hasten the day when this whole system of blood-shed, borrowed from savagery, and perpetuated by Christian nations, shall be banished from the world, and peaceful methods be substituted in its place for the adjustment of national greed or misunderstandings.

A Gem Worth Preserving.

Col. Ingersoll was invited in 1883 to attend an anniversary dinner of the Clover Club, a social organization in the city of Philadelphia. Here are his regrets on that occasion. It is characteristic of the great orator:

"I regret I cannot be with you tonight, 'in clover.' A wonderful thing is clover. It means honey and cream; that is to say, it means industry and contentment; it means the hum of happy bees in perfumed fields, and at the cottage gate 'Old Boss,' the bountiful, serenely chewing satisfaction's cud in that blessed twilight pause, which, like a benediction, falls between the hours of toil and sleep.

"A wonderful thing is clover. It makes me dream of other days, of childhood hours, of dimpled babies, of loving wives and honest men, of streams and woods and violets, and all there is of stainless joy and peaceful human life.

"A wonderful word is clover. Take away the 'c' and you have the happiest of mankind; take away the 'c' and 'r' and you have the only thing that makes a heaven of this dull and barren earth; take away the 'r' alone, and yet there remains a warm, deceitful bud, that sweetens the breath and helps to keep the peace in countless homes whose masters frequent clubs.

"After all, Bottom in Shakespeare was right: 'Good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.'"

"The Majesty of Calmness, or Individual Problems and Possibilities," By Wm. George Jordan. Another valuable little work. Price 30 cents. For sale at this office.

"Why I Am a Vegetarian." By J. Howard Moore. An address before the Chicago Vegetarian Society. Price 25 cents.

Revival of an Old Creed.

Rev. Chas. H. Parkhurst, of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York, has just made the startling discovery that the scriptures do not teach the immortality of all souls; that only those who are properly fitted for another life will survive the tomb. That is a decided improvement on the Presbyterian creed, and its eternity of hell-fire for the wicked; but it is nothing new. There was an old sect known as Destructionists, who maintained the same doctrine. Among the texts they quoted was Romans 8:6—"The wages of sin is death; but eternal life is the gift of God, through Christ Jesus our Lord."

Without regard to what Rev. Parkhurst teaches, or Paul, as for that, is it not more probable immortality is an inheritance of life, no way contingent on good deeds, or influenced by bad ones, save if not fitted for the new abode when disincumbered from the body, he is disciplined by loved ones until he is fitted to share the pleasures of his new home? This is the teaching of the spirit world, and it seems to us strictly in harmony with all the inculcations of Nature.

A Priestly Prophecy.

When William Caxton, in 1474, set up a printing press at Westminster, the clergy were greatly alarmed. Lewis' History of the Translation of the Bible into English, p. 55, says:

"The vicar of Croydon expressed himself to the following purpose in a sermon which he preached at St. Paul's Cross about this time: 'We must root out printing, or printing will root out us.'"

As the clergy did not succeed in "rooting out" the press, which they designated as the Devil's Art, it looks very much at this time as if the alternative of the prophecy is rapidly approaching fulfillment.

Congratulatory.

Our Presbyterian brethren are to be congratulated on some apparent substantial progress in the revision of their Confession of Faith. In the old version which has been the creed of the church ever since it was formulated by the Westminster Assembly of Divines, it was taught, by implication at least, that while "elect infants" were saved, non-elect infants were damned. If this were not the inferential belief, why use the word "elect?"

While such belief was held in the long ago, the humane sentiment of more modern times has caused the great mass of members to grow into a more generous faith, so that as a whole the church has ceased to believe in infant damnation. This argues a wholesome growth since the time when an eminent divine could declare that "Hell was paved with the skulls of infants not a span long."

While congratulating our friends on their apparent progress in saving all infants from Hell, we shall expect them to keep right on progressing, until all adults as well as infants will be found among the elect. After arriving at that point of progress, they will be prepared to accept Spiritualism.

The Mediums' Home.

The special attention of our readers is called to a communication from Mrs. Mary T. Longley, the efficient secretary of the N. S. A., concerning the Mediums' Home, at Reed City, Mich.

The Mediums' Home is a most worthy object, deserving the unstinted and generous support of all Spiritualists. The purpose for which the Home is established must commend the enterprise to every humanitarian heart, and it is to be hoped that Mrs. Longley's statement will meet with hearty and generous response from the friends of our cause. Such an institution well established will tend to strengthen Spiritualism, increase our influence and make our cause a greater factor for good.

Highly Commendable.

The mass-meeting of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association did a commendable work in its outspoken and emphatic condemnation of fake mediumship.

There is nothing else so detrimental to the standing of our cause before the public, so injurious to us in the estimation of sincere and honest seekers for truth, as trickery and deception in the name of mediumship. Tricksters may thrive by it, for a time, but the cause is sure to suffer in consequence of their nefarious work. Spiritualism is compelled to bear the blame and discredit for the vicious and dishonest practices of dishonest or pretended mediums.

There should be a general awakening of Spiritualists to the evils of fake mediumship, and a healthy determination to extirpate, so far as possible, the whole nefarious business of fraud under the name of Spiritualism and mediumship. Honest, genuine mediums should be encouraged and generously protected and aided; but their worst enemies, the dishonest and deceivers, should be relegated to the limbo of utter condemnation and extermination.

Of Interest to Magnetic Healers.

Of interest to magnetic healers and osteopaths is a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, as follows:

In the case against Joseph P. Gordon of Winnebago county, to recover the penalty he paid for practicing medicine without a license, the court holds that magnetic healers and osteopaths must procure license from the state board of health before practicing their professions in Illinois. This is the first time the court has passed upon the matter. This case came to the court from Rockford. Gordon advertised himself as a "healer" and procured business in Rockford. He was prosecuted for practicing medicine without a license, and the Circuit Court directed the jury to find for the defendant. The verdict is reversed and case remanded.

Louis H. Freedman, M. D.

Dr. Freedman informs us that Justice Everett dismissed the case of the State Medical Board instituted against him, on the ground that the Doctor being a graduate of Dutton's Medical College before the medical act came into force July 1, 1899, he can not be interfered with in the practice of his profession. He only received $3.50 in contributions to aid him in this fight. The Doctor writes: "Indeed, when will I stop being a stone wall for others to throw at, and have so little help and sympathy from those for whom I am clearing the pathway of hold-ups and injustice?"

Beliefs and "Suggestion."

The New York Herald of a recent date contains an interesting account by Rene Bache, about curious beliefs among various tribes and peoples, principally pertaining to medicine. It illustrates the power of faith and allied "suggestion."

The writer says a Scythian lamb—one of the rarest curiosities in the world, has been secured, by the National Museum. Many travelers' tales have been based upon this strange animal, which during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was understood in Europe to be in part of the nature of a plant, springing from a seed. It was said to feed on the surrounding herbage, turning on its root until it had eaten everything within reach, when it perished of starvation. Faith in the existence of the creature thus described was as complete in the middle ages as is our belief to-day in tigers or alligators.

The Tartarean lamb, as it is otherwise called, was of exceeding rarity, and found only in remote and inaccessible localities. It is known to-day in China as the "golden haired dog," and in that country is regularly bred for use as medicine. Actually it is the root-stock of a plant, covered with soft brown hair, which in form and general appearance counterfeits an animal surprisingly, the lower parts of the stems taking the place of legs. From this odd likeness arose the myth, which is surely one of the oddest ever evolved.

Now, scientists who have beheld this vegetable lamb since its arrival at the Museum have made some interesting comments upon its relation to medical folk lore and sorcery, the two being very closely connected. It is easy to see why the woolly root in the likeness of an animal got the reputation of being in truth a young sheep, inasmuch as the untutored human mind always follows out that line of reasoning in regard to any inanimate object that assumes the form of bird, beast or man even to the extent of a suggestion thereof. A Zuni Indian sees a pretty stone that has to his eye somewhat the shape of a mountain lion. He knows that a mountain lion must live in that stone; so he picks it up and carefully preserves it, in the faith that it represents the magical power of the brute which inhabits it.

From the viewpoint of the savage, everything is somebody. Inside of every inanimate object resides some kind of a spirit—a fact which becomes especially manifest when the thing assumes the likeness of a living creature. This idea, which has to do with the very beginning of faith in the supernatural, has excited much interest on the part of government ethnologists, who have collected and placed in the National Museum many strange curios illustrating the subject.

Inasmuch as all diseases are supposed to be caused by evil spirits, magic of one kind or another is required to drive them out of the persons afflicted, and that is where sorcery and medicine meet. In fact, the earliest medical practitioners were sorcerers, and among savages to-day the accredited physician is a witch doctor, and depends for the success of his remedies upon incantations, rites of exorcism and other mumbo-jumbo business. If quinine has power to cure chills and fever, for example, it is not, in the primitive conception, because it kills malaria germs, but for the reason that the bitter stuff is disliked by the demon of that malady so extremely that he abandons the premises.

In Japan snake skin is imagined to be a sovereign remedy for abdominal pains. Reptiles of this kind have a habit of burrowing and hiding, which enables them to penetrate the innermost parts of the body, and hence the peculiar virtue of their exuviae. There is a connection of ideas that serves very well to illustrate the mode of argument by which among primitive peoples belief in the curative power of a thing is reached. In the museum's collection are a number of dried toads, which have been prepared by a process of skinning, evisceration and subsequent desication. They are prescribed, in China, as a febrifuge, probably because they live in cool places.

It is always a help, where magical powers of animals are concerned, if their mode of life is in any way mysterious. The toad comes under that head, dwelling as it does in holes and being nocturnal in its habits. One may say the same thing of lizards, and hence it is not surprising to find in the collection some carefully prepared reptiles of this sort, which have been disembowelled, neatly stretched upon bamboo splinters and dried. Just what diseases they are good for is not explained, but they are ugly enough to frighten almost any zymotic goblin.

The primitive medical man, however, does not depend for his magical apparatus wholly upon natural objects. He makes a good deal of it for himself. One finds the Indian shaman, or sorcerer, frightening the disease spirits with a wooden rattle covered with buckskin and made up in the shape of a turtle, while for similar purposes of exorcism the Thibetan lama wields a whip with a handle of human bone and lashes of human skin, beating the while upon a drum formed out of the upper part of two human skulls. Anything weird and unpleasant is always useful in magic.

The Zuni Indian forms a clay image to represent the mountain lion, and the spirit of that animal, which is the guardian of the North and the master of the gods of the hunt, comes to dwell in the object, protecting the owner from injury by accident and helping him to success in the chase. Another fetich of the kind in the collection described is a small human figure on all fours, cut out of wood and painted red. It is the likeness of a sorcerer of whom certain diseases are afraid, and those maladies will keep away from the house so long as the image is within.

As one might expect, many of the most notable medical curios are from China, and among them are turtle shells—the turtle is everywhere regarded among primitive peoples as a mysterious and, therefore, potent animal—and also tigers bones, dried pipe fishes (odd looking and unlike ordinary fishes) and carbonized monkeys' skulls. The skulls are prepared by putting them into clay vessels, which are exposed to heat until the crania are thoroughly calcined. These last, however, are from Japan, and so also are the carbonized birds, which are prepared exactly in the same way. Both birds and monkeys are excellent tonics, presumably on account of their lively habits. The edible birds' nests, which are built by several species of swallows out of the gelatinous substance of seaweeds, partly digested and disgorged, are believed to be most invigorating as medicine for sick people.

When a savage is walking along and happens to strike his foot against a stake, stubbing his toe, he first goes back and kicks the stake to punish it, and then he drives it into the ground, saying, "You shall not hurt anybody else!" He whistles and an echo responds. Obviously, there must be some person to make that reply. Somebody must be over there or he could not have whistled back. Every natural phenomenon is somebody; everything, in fact, is somebody. Some of the spirits that thus surround the primitive man are hostile to him, while others are friendly, and it is an important part of the business of life to encourage the friendly ones and frighten away those that are hostile. Certain members of the tribe, whose office is commonly hereditary, make a special study of this art of handling the spirits. They are the priests, or mystery men, and, being maintained by fees, are not obliged to do other work for their living.

A spirit has no difficulty in going out of one thing and getting into another. Thus the demon of a disease may be induced by suitable incantations or other magical rites to leave the body of a patient and take up its residence elsewhere. It is the old doctrine of "possession" and the driving out of devils. Costume is an important aid in this sort of work, and among the Indians of the Northwest coast the sacerdotal apparel of the mystery man includes a wooden mask ugly enough to startle the most courageous goblin.

From China the National Museum has obtained some curious boluses which are mixtures of musk, camphor and other drugs, made up in the shape of spheres about the size of the candy balls that children buy for a cent apiece. Each ball is covered with gold leaf and enclosed in a capsule of wax. They are very expensive, but are supposed to be powerful medicine, and considerable quantities of them are imported into this country from the Middle Kingdom for the use of Chinese people in the United States.

One object in the collection that is particularly interesting is a prism of glass, used for hypnotizing people. Any bright thing held before the eyes of a person subject to the mesmeric influence helps to induce that strange condition of artificial somnambulism, and balls of crystal have been employed not uncommonly for the purpose. But mysterious as hypnotism is when considered from the viewpoint of the psychologist, there is nothing of the supernatural about it, and objects of the kind referred to are mere devices for concentrating the attention of the individual experimented with.

The Japanese doctor knows very little more of anatomy and physiology than the Chinese physician, and for purposes of diagnosis he relies mainly upon the pulse. He finds three pulses on each wrist, and he will explain to you that the heart controls the right upper pulse, the lungs the left upper, the stomach the right middle, the liver the left middle, the right kidney the right lower, and the left kidney the left lower. Thus, by a careful examination of your six pulses, it is easy for him to ascertain exactly what is the matter with you.

No doubt the suggestion will shock some sensitive minds under the dominating influence of the prevailing orthodox theology, but wherein are these notions concerning medicine more absurd and inconsequential than the "evangelical" notions concerning the moral and spiritual cures to be effected by being "washed in the redeeming blood" of a substitutional sacrifice?

In the case of the Indians, etc., and the clay image, the snake skin, carbonized bones and monkeys' skulls, no doubt the now well-established principle of "suggestion" will operate in many instances to effect a genuine cure of diseases.

This same principle of "suggestion" may apply in the case of those who accept orthodox ideas concerning sin and salvation; believing in and accepting the method of cure may aid in effecting a change within that may affect a person's whole after life and modes of thought. By applying in a symbolic sense the means "suggested" there may be brought about a more or less complete turning away from the old habits, unto a more desirable status of character and life.

That there are and have been changes wrought in individuals, under the influence of "revival" excitement, and through orthodox teaching and preaching, there can be no doubt—changes for the better, and lasting in effects—but as for the influence or power producing these results, it can all be simmered down to hypnotism or simple "suggestion."

Mediumship and Poetry

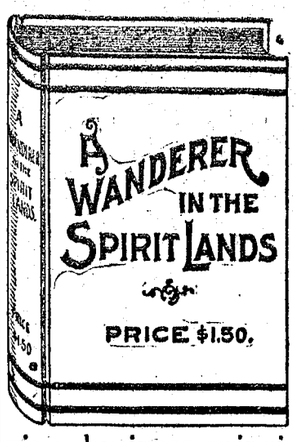
The most important outcome of spiritual science is, in my judgment, the dethroning of the old "King of Terrors," Death. And this is effected by spirit manifestations through the agency of mediumship. Many millions of converts to the belief in spirit communication have been made in the last fifty years and thousands of mediums have been developed in home circles. "Mediumship and Its Laws," by Hudson Tuttle, a book of 158 pages, price 35 cents, is just the thing wanted for that purpose. It is indeed a guide book.

"Asphodel Blooms and Other Offerings," by Emma Rood Tuttle, is her second volume of poems, all good, and many of a superior order. Asphodel is defined by Webster as a perennial plant cultivated for the beauty of its flowers." I am unable to learn whether the plant is cultivated in this country. From a book shown me at the Agricultural Department, I learn that it is a hardy, herbaceous, stemless plant, with lily-like flowers; that in the Greek mythology it was the peculiar flower of the dead; that in Greece it was a common weed; that Homer mentions the asphodel meadows of the dead, where the shades of heroes congregate in hades; that daffodil is a corruption of asphodel; and that the asphodel of the early English and French poets was the narcissus or pseudo-narcissus.

There is a cheerful tone in Mrs. Tuttle's poems, even those on grave themes such as "My Agnosticism," one line of which reads, "So I kiss the lips of Fate," while some others, such as "How the Deacon Made a Skeptic," the deacon being the father of Hudson Tuttle, causes one to laugh. And the prose contributions of Clair Tuttle are delightful additions, especially suited to the young, as are also many of the poems. WM. HENRY BURR.

"Filthy Little Atheist."

I see it stated in a certain history that Thomas Paine was a "filthy little atheist." These words seem to hold a history of the author. Neither "filthy" nor "little" come involuntarily to a pure, scientific mind; they indicate the anger of theology, and, regarding facts in their integrity, are false.



In prison, Thomas Paine did not write against Jesus Christ the man, but he claimed that "He was the son of God in like manner that every other person is." Even the writer of the history.

Neither was the noble, patriotic Paine an atheist. Unfortunately, in his time, his mind had not developed so as to recognize the beauty and far-reaching quality of the word atheist, which, supported by the truths of the universe, has been gradually brought, through time, to a position of honor, claiming that we know of a universe of matter and law, but know nothing of a God; know of the harmony of uniform laws, but nothing of a divine arbitrary will. Know of the purity, strength of character and happiness knowledge gives, but nothing of a place of bliss somewhere in space, nor of that horrid place of private torture called hell.

Justice to the dead, to futurity, to humanity and to the author demand that the words "filthy" and little" should be recalled. M. M. T.

WHEN THE LOVING MISTRESS DIES.

Strange how many things will center
In a loving woman's life,
And how many hearts cast anchor
Near a true, home-keeping wife,
If consuming ills betide her,
Taking her from life away,
What a shifting and unchaining,
All because she could not stay.

First her husband's heart unsettles,
All his hopes are cast adrift;
Every plan is like a cobweb
Which a breath may tear and lift.
Sad reminders of her face him
Every moment of each day;
He can feel one ruling impulse;
He must change,—must go away!

So, not counting at the outset
All the harrowing things to do,
He decides to sell the home-lands
And go into something new;
Sever all the old connections
With the house, the lands, the trees,
Go to strangers, new employment,
Fly from Sorrow's fierce disease.

First the faithful horses face him;—
They were raised upon the farm.
How she loved them and was watchful
They should know not want nor harm.
They, too, miss her, but they know not
Of the silent mystery
Which has locked her from their vision,
And her loving ministry.

He must sell them; how uncertain
Is the life they then will lead.
Will they miss the friendly master?
Want for water? want for feed?
And the sweet-breathed cows, so gentle,
They must pass to other hands,
All because one loving lady
Died. "Why?"—Oh, God understands!

And the dog, so fond and faithful,
Her companion and her guard;
How he lay anear the casket,
Which his stricken mistress barred
Waiting for her hand to feed him,
She, who never once forgot;
Since she sleeps so long and stilly
He must leave the lonesome spot.

Silent sits her buff canary,
Moping on its unwashed perch.
It, too, misses its dead mistress,—
Fain would pass its bars to search.
Into other hands the birdling
Must with tearful eyes be given;
It will sing for list'ning strangers,
Since its dear one sings in heaven.

Kitty feels the great commotion,
Shy she hunts outside the house,
Since her table food is missing,
For that stingy meal, a mouse!
Soon the home will be deserted,
Its belongings scattered wide!
Things are changed so, and unsettled,
Since the loving mistress died.

A SPLENDID OFFER.

Good News for the N. S. A. Mediums Home.

To the Editor:—Again I come asking your generous permission to place the following statement and appeal before the readers of your valuable paper—but this time it is not all appeal, for I have the good news to impart that through the promised generosity of two noble men in our ranks, the repairing and establishing of the N. S. A. Mediums' Home at Reed City is only the matter of a few months at most, provided the Spiritualists at large will meet these two men half way, and will contribute a like sum to the treasury of the Mediums' Relief Fund of the National Association.

It has already been stated in your columns that the N. S. A. has purchased a property in Reed city, Mich., adjoining the sanitarium of Dr. Spinney, and that its intentions are to repair and put this property into shape for a home for destitute mediums. Also, that we have made arrangements with Dr. Spinney to take care of such of our inmates of that home, as might be ill and need special nursing, in his sanitarium, which is fully equipped for such work. The good doctor has donated a piece of land adjoining upon which additions to the Mediums' Home may be built when necessary, and when sufficient funds can be secured for the purpose. According to estimates, we find it will cost one thousand dollars to repair and properly arrange the building for a comfortable home, and to put in pipes and radiators for steam heating. It will also take a goodly sum to furnish the Home, and to get it started with occupants, for after the home is ready for occupancy, the inmates must be fed and otherwise cared for. We realize that this will be an expensive undertaking, but its grand, good object, to care for and tenderly remember the good souls that have served as instruments to the spirit world in reaching earth with consolation and instruction, will appeal to the heart of every Spiritualist and draw sympathy and money in its support from each one. As a surety of this, I am to-day commissioned to reveal to the public, that the N. S. A. executive board has created a Mediums' Relief Fund, according to Art. VII. of its By-Laws, (a), and that the purchase money of the home has been appropriated to that fund. Following this, two noble souls in our ranks, Mr. T. J. Mayer and another, who for personal reasons desires to be known in this connection as "A friend to the Mediums' Home," have notified us that they will each contribute seven hundred and fifty dollars to the Mediums' Relief Fund for repair and starting of the Reed City Home, provided that the Spiritualists at large will contribute a like sum, fifteen hundred dollars more, by the first of May.

Here is a glorious chance for the opening of a Mediums' Home; with fifteen hundred dollars from these two grand donors, and fifteen hundred more from the Spiritualists at large, we will have three thousand dollars with which to repair, furnish and open the Home, and put in at least a few of the worthy ones who need a home. With the project thus started and our mediums in the home, in comfort and free from anxiety, we are sure the Spiritualists will not allow it to go down or be closed for want of funds to keep it going, and we know this is the right moment for action, and time to begin the good work. Therefore we call on the generous of heart to send in their contributions at once, in any sums, large or small, all will be gladly accepted for this good work. We have already on hand, contributions from the following: Woman's Industrial Circle of Dallas, $20.50; seance by C. H. Figuers and other Cleveland mediums, $20; Mrs. A. Peacock, $5; Mary T. Longley, $5; Mrs. Bertha White, $4; J. F. Handlon $2; J. E. Hopkins, $2; Miss C. H. Hubbard, $1; Phillip Dick, $1; Geo. A. Shultz, $1; Lotela, $1; W. H. Souther, $1; Delpha Pearl Hughes, $1; Mrs. Helen Tinkham, $5; John Kamer, $1; G. W. Macatee, 50 cents; Nannie, 20 cents; Mrs. Blanchard, 20 cents; A friend, 10 cents.

Who will be the next? We need all the funds we can get for this glorious work, a work that humanity and the angels demand of us and which they will bless. Send your contributions to the N. S. A. secretary, 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.; they will be acknowledged.

We wish the public to understand that every penny contributed to this relief fund will be used for the support of the mediums in this Home, as the property is fully paid for and it has no mortgage or incumbrance of any kind. It is our desire to have a neat, comfortable and pleasant home for our mediums; and the money utilized in support of the same will do its best work instead of being expended in paying interest on mortgages, or for unserviceable land.

With loving greetings to all,
MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

A Lesson and Its Uses. = By Sar'gis.

To the Editor:—There is an old adage about things coming to him that waits, and it has been illustrated in the case of your humble servant and that of Mrs. Piper. Had the first impulse been followed there would have been bitter words used and uncomplimentary references—all seriously. As it now is as it is, a mere reporter's make up—a long string of Hudson puerilities repeated by a reporter seeking "good stuff" for a sensation, things look different. But after all it has its lesson and its uses.

In one direction it was a lesson to the tuft-hunting Spiritualist, who is ever harping on the "scientific" demonstration of phenomena, and the itchers for "respectability." As a rule "science" in things Spiritualistic is mainly bigotry, and "respectability" but ignorance with good clothes on. But such are with us and have to be reckoned with. It is best to be philosophic. But it has had one good effect. It has compelled that remarkable self-elected organization of snobbery, yclept the Society for Psychical Research, to defend itself from the insinuations of the reporter—that it had been fooled by a woman who didn't even believe in herself. Prof. Hodgson himself has been thawed out.

And lastly it has been the occasion of another of those luminous expositions through Mrs. Richmond of the true position—that spirit is above science—or that science is but the knowledge and illustrative demonstration of spirit. Her discourse in The Progressive Thinker of November 30 last, has in it more Spiritualism, more philosophy, more real science than is found in all the records of the Research Society for the fourteen years of their Mrs. Piper results An extract or two is all that will be reproduced here. Here is a scientific truth in the real sense of the word:

"If there is that which is beyond science, and there is the great realm of superconsciousness in human existence, that realm can take possession of science, can make science its handmaiden."

SCIENCE AND COMMON SENSE.

Here in a sentence is the whole matter as to scientific Spiritualism. Science is the knowledge of nature, its laws or functions. Spirit is nature manifesting in these laws or functions. To test the higher by the lesser is effort misapplied—the reverse of cause and effect. Science can be enlightened and instructed by spirit, but spirit can never be compassed by science. And our talkers about the scientific demonstration of Spiritualism are simply talking up a vacuum.

Again, Mrs. Richmond sums up the situation by another volume sentence that illuminates while it crushes. Speaking of the message of spirit to the sorrow-stricken heart that those who flock to the medium for consolation, seek, she says:

"So when any medium developed by the unseen world, to give such evidence to human life is taken possession of by any set of men or society in order that the facts may be investigated, not from the standpoint of the great human need, but as a butterfly or a bug or any other thing would be investigated, it ceases to fulfill the object for which it was intended."

As true as truth is this criticism, and it disposes of the whole batch of pseudo-scientific talkers with whom spirit is uncomprehended if not incomprehensible. There are thousands of "illiterate phenomenalists" to-day who are richer in spirit lore, in evidence of survival after death and of return and communion, than all the Hodgsons, Hyslops, Savages, or "scholars" that have so interminably of late darkened opinion by want of knowledge—or candor. We are overrun with a surplus of science and are anemic from a shortage in common sense. Words now largely stand for substance. What the "cause" needs just now is the advent of an Artemus Ward, to show to the rank and file of Spiritualists these latter-day teachers, leaders and philosophers in their true perspective. What is the result? To the outside reader of the Spiritualist press its contents must be somewhat of a riddle, or conundrum: First, is a column or two devoted to a holy horror over "fraud," with all the stock changes rung on its enormity. Second: An equal or greater space taken up with accounts of wonderful seances all over the world, of tests overwhelming in evidence, predictions verified and manifestations as unquestionable as sight, hearing and responsive mental proof can make them. Third: A jeremiad over the decline of Spiritualism, and the cry "unite or perish" sounded like a fire-bell in the night, or with all the suggestive solemnity of a voice from the bowels of some deep mine or cavern of the earth. And fourthly: Jubilant letters, advices, extracts from all sources of the phenomenal spread of Spiritualism and in its power in molding opinions of the world's thinkers and leaders in religious and ethical thought. All these can be found in almost any current issue of our press, and so thoroughly systematized has it become that the observant reader has only to see the name of a writer to know exactly the tone of the article. So well known are they that titles might be given—as "John Jones, G. G." (general grumbler, and so on. But the burden of most of them is money. You would think to read after them that Spiritualists were or are the meanest, stingiest, most sordidly selfish and material-bound people on earth. Why? Simply because they fail to recognize the dictation of a class of professionalists. But despite all the scolding, the average Spiritualist persists preferably in visiting mediums or in listening to mediumistic speakers from the platform. And under deep inspiration and control the prediction is here recorded—that they always will.

Spiritualism came to this modern world by and after the method of spirits. The fact of life following this was established and continuously demonstrated by their own arrangements. They do not, so to speak, run this world, nor can we run theirs—or them. The fact they bring to us is to be utilized for our advancement in knowledge—individually. We may and do go to hear speakers, read books and papers, to hear or obtain the theories and philosophies, enjoy their style or talent, as it may interest or instruct. But we don't take our ethics or orders from any, however able, nor from any aggregation of such, however learned or respectable they may be after the manner of the mass. Much less, we are not to be caught by the methods of any ancient or modern priestly propaganda in the toils or formalities or assumed authority of any kind. And the world may as well take note of this fact first as last. But this is enough on that subject.

SPIRITS AND SCIENCE.

In former articles mention has been made of the relation of spirits to science. No doubt our leaders will soon begin to tell us what Prof. Loeb and Marconi are doing, and Dr. "G. G.," inspired by some Jamieson-brained gadabout, will ask "why spirits have not told of these things?" And this despite the fact that for a generation just these have been foreshadowed by spirits, and in books and publications as well, over and over again. But that was from "uneducated" mediumship, and not to be considered by mnemotechnic learning. People who call themselves Spiritualists and assume to be teachers are silent as to these facts. But as their discussion takes us outside the text books to those who live by talking, this is heresy and anathema.

For example: Prof. Loeb tells us that he has demonstrated that life manifestation is not from heat, as the science of the scientists tells us, but to "chemical energy in electrically charged molecules." What is this but Prof. Lockwood's Molecular Hypothesis, that receives only half-concealed opposition from our leaders? Why, the writer, without assuming anything but the role of a listener, was told more than twenty years ago by a "control" that our scientists were at fault in this regard, and that "all life is chemical." In long interviews this "guide" would elaborate this proposition and insist that some day when they could find the organism to do the work the fact would be given to the world. Yet the medium through whom these discourses or conversations came, knew no more of chemistry than that involved in making good yeast bread.

Next we will be berated for stinginess in not pouring out money to endow professorships to teach what Professor Loeb has discovered, after having kept Lockwood on half-rations for years, teaching the same thing. What is the X-ray but laboratory clairvoyance? Because a microscope or a telescope reveals what the natural eye does not see, doesn't affect the fact of sight—they are only aids to seeing. So with the Crookes tube—it assists clear seeing, which the medium has without its help. Nature holds all knowledge, and it is flat egotism and quackery for us to set up as teachers of superior wisdom because we have discovered or guessed at one of its attributes. And so it is that these trumpeted discoveries by science have been given us from time to time as mediumship furnished the Crookes tubes—only not understood because our intellects were not as clear as that of the announcer from his vantage of clearer seeing.

And next comes the riddle of Marconi—a thing that spirits have been heralding since they first availed themselves of Morse's invention to tell us the secret of their world, and their living. And this brings us back again to the idea that has crippled science and philosophy so long—that this was a made world, and finished as to its matter—or inert and dead. Franklin had discovered what Prof. Loeb now demonstrates, nearly a hundred years before Morse made it practical in use. And now after more than fifty years of telegraphing it is discovered that the earth is all the conductor needed. Is not this a remarkable fact to now record, when from the beginning a "ground wire" was needed to complete "the circuit?"

But time has not been the only disability. One of the victims of this obtuseness has been Spiritualism. A mere speculative ignorer of facts has tried to account for what he could not comprehend by conjectures as to sub-consciousness, another self, etc. And to the stultification of true spiritual philosophy we have the terminology of thought-transference, telepathy, and so forth. What a pity Marconi did not come a little sooner, so that his battery might have supplied the brains to have avoided this theoretic miscarriage.

EARTH AND ATMOSPHERE.

One thing seems to be left out by our scientists, and that is that the earth and the atmosphere together constitute our world. Of course they will say yes, but all will recognize the fact that in scientific exposition they are treated as separate. Embrace both in the thought and wireless telegraphy becomes more comprehensible. Live worlds have atmospheres. When there is no atmosphere the world is dead—no agency being left to promote chemical action, or as Prof. Loeb has it—life. All life being chemical, we can see that the life battery, so to speak, which the earth and air is, needs for its uses the rocks, the minerals, the metals, coals, oils, the gases and other elements contained therein. And the lamina of the crust acted upon by the air that reaches the interior by crevices, breaks and caverns, laved, too, by the unseen rivers, lakes and dripping arches—all exciting agents in chemical activity—or the life forces that sustain the organized forms upon its surface where the two burst into the forms and families and varieties we call nature.

EARTH A LIVING ORGANISM.

In some of these screeds reference has been made to the theory of gravity, and its weakening as a working hypothesis. Let a thinker try and apply its formula to wireless telegraphy, and this will be so strongly manifest that the scientific nose will no longer be elevated at its mention. But make the earth a living organism after the manner outlined, with its circulatory system thus combined and blended, instead of an inert mass held in place by attractive pulls, it will be alive and responsive to its modes of correlation, from its heart to its outermost influences. Science tells us that man is a microcosm, but there it has stopped and never seemingly tried to think the macrocosm like the man—a thing of action.

But Prof. Loeb has gone farther. He claims electricity as the basis of life, induced by chemical action—one the product or consequent of the other. If he had only said expression of life it would have been more spiritually expressed. But he has done one thing—demonstrated that life as we can know it, is but force, or a force—the only form of objective expression in anything. And so we cannot think gravity and force both. According to gravity, objective being—in any direction—is only equilibrium between opposite pulls. If a man wants to go to the right a second man pulls him to the left, and a third man pulls him to the right—with equal pulls the man is stationary, or keeps straight ahead—or according to gravity a planet in its orbit. How is wireless telegraphy going to work in such a pull? It is this even pull hypothesis that governs scientific thinking in the face of orbital motion, the solar system and outside planets. And it is all from a scare of mathematics. And what, pray, is mathematics? "The science of quantity, the study of ideal constructions." And under this comes gravity—an ideal thing. It does not come under applied mathematics, which is distinct and has no ideal elements whatever. So after all it is a mere hypothetical theory as to the existence and formation of worlds—and was so regarded by Newton himself.

Now try to think of this earth as the result of applied force, and so held and turned—force is necessarily motion, and all motion is rotary or spiral, as we see in oceans, air, clouds, plants, or animals—or a cosmos in logical harmony of observed phenomena. And so it is that Loeb as well as Lockwood finds molecules charged with chemical energy—force that is rhythmical, and rhythmical because rotary—a straight line cannot evolve rhythm, nor can opposing pulls be harmonious.

It is to be hoped that sometime our scientists, at least on the spiritual platform, will drop the use of atoms and molecules. The terms are intensely physical and do not express the idea of formative substance, so much as they do the conditions of the drug store. Without the "particle of matter" the theory of gravity has no initiative in thinking.

But one thing is plainer in the latest paper by Prof. Loeb than in its predecessor. He does not yet claim to know what life is. In his report of his Wood's Holl experiments with sea urchin eggs, it was given out that the hatching could be done without fertilization by the male. So eagerly was this taken up that one enthusiastics writer hailed it as proof that immaculate conception was a fact in science. But this time the claim is only that the responsiveness of the egg to fertilization could be greatly prolonged—which showed the adaptability of the cell life to chemical preservation—a fact bearing upon longevity. And so it is, the dogma of immaculate conception is yet without scientific support. Will its advocates be as ready to wait on scientific theology as they demand us to linger along for the advent of scientific Spiritualism?

And next our appointed mentors are fond of another assumed superior state. In their airy way, strongly provocative of the humorous, they patronizingly refer to those who look to the spirit world as the better schoolmaster as mere "spiritists"—that we are not Spiritualists, with a big S—that we somehow are not in it with those who talk the philosophy, and run disparaging parallels between spiritists and Methodists, Catholics and other sects and the way they contribute money to the support of their organizations. The one society or church that for its numbers excels all others in material prosperity and sect property is the Mormon. The greater the delusion and the more pronounced the superstition the larger the revenue—see Dowie as an individual example. The more spiritists the better for the world. And if we can find no higher inspiration than competing with the church for tithes, the worse for the spiritual advancement of our fellow-men. We then become our own greatest obstacle.

What follows may not sound harmonious, but there is not a drop of bitterness in the fountain. There is just now great felicitation over the prospect for a spiritual college, to teach and graduate mediums. Also homes for broken-down, or, as the churches have it, superannuated mediums. As to the homes, it had been a blessing to many a poor, vitally depleted medium crushed by ex-exhausting seances—rope-tying, mouth-plastered, nose-plugged tests, all for the benefit of science and "respectable" idiots—if they had been open years ago. Had they been the complained of dearth of mediums below a given age would not have been so apparent. The suggestion has with it a tragedy. But better late than not at all, still it is a confession of a terrible blunder, that only the mental conditions of an unspiritual age can excuse. It looks like beginning at the wrong end. Why have any broken-down mediums, save from the ignorance or worse of the non-mediumistic world—largely, too, of Spiritualists? The cry for scientific endorsement and the craze for "respectable" patronage have done more to break down mediums than all else besides. The fate of the Fox girls, of Slade, and more that will suggest themselves, would not encourage parents to dedicate a sensitive child to such uses. If the selfish curiosity, well-meant but inconsiderate hospitality after fashionable methods of those early investigators, had not sapped the very life of these marvelous instruments they might be with us to-day consecrated by the value of their message to humanity. Mediums should never be broken down, but live and ripen to a beneficent old age. Educate the world to protect mediums, throw around them the sympathetic confidence of our homes, according them quiet and freedom from the wolf of rents and restaurants, and more will be done to spread the gospel of Spiritualism than any and all efforts to found a hierarchy or profession in our ranks. When a medium is regarded as a teacher and found at our firesides instead of up a back stairs, with a card nailed on a door leading to a gas-stove, there will be less need for this incessant cry for revenue and the scolding about stinginess.

But a college for educating mediums with a faculty that have no mediumship has a rather funny aspect, at first glance. It will be one of the marvels of this extraordinary age—won't it? How are they to know of mediumship? The outside world can't tell them; the mediums can't, for they are "uneducated;" nor can the spirit world, for the faculty are non-conductors—not sensitive to impression or even contact. As the man said of an experience: "In visions of the night when deep sleep falleth on men," something made my flesh to creep, and my hair to stand up—as in the case of Eliphaz, the Temanite—but I could not tell whether it was a dream, a vision, a spirit or a bed-bug. But this is not captious, it is only scientific.

But the spirit world is wise, and to get a college at all, it may be necessary to follow the ways of the world—the spiritual teachers in good time may follow when the material brick, mortar and salary work has been done. Let no one lift a finger in any way but to help. Then wait and see and hope and work for the best to come.

SAR'GIS.

When we compare the Methodist ministry of forty years ago, in breadth and culture, with the same ministry of to-day a remarkable change for the better is shown, the credit for which, in large degree, should be given to the Chautauquan method instituted. This is quite significant to the subject in hand; for a great similarity of claim as to mechanical inspiration is held by many Spiritualists that was held by Methodism in its lowest estate—a sin to educate for the ministry. Possibly the C. L. F. Association at an inopportune time made effort along the line of suggested methods. It should be borne in mind that a quiet revolution is going on, unconscious to the masses, where many of the philosophies, ologies and teachings of yesterday, in a sense, are made obsolete to-day. If Chautauqua is on the wane I think herein lies the secret.

The Spiritualist literature mill, particularly in biology, is grinding out an excellent grist which, when bolted, carefully sifted and classified now, can be pushed to the reading public. Not a few of the clergy clandestinely seek and peruse this new literature. Not a few in all lines of thought and all denominations of religion suspect there may be on and over the hill a vision of broader scope and planes dotted with spiritual truth blossoms unknown to their consciousness.

The key to this quiet revolution and new revelation is held by the Spiritualist. Shall he turn it to a more pronounced and rapid benefit to the human race?

With the proposed school in Wisconsin for the West Central States, and one of a like character in New England to meet the needs of that section, and an Institute at Lily Dale of the character outlined, we would be recognizing the basic principles on which rest all superstructures of science, religion, art, philosophy, etc. Our National and State Boards would be set a-doing instead of resolving. They would have a greater number of efficient missionaries for the field and a better prepared and motived candidacy for the ministry. Societies prosper from intelligent and tactical management, and true reforms would feel the efforts of an earnest, concerted, consecrated people. Instead of the frequent expression, "I haint got no use for them papers and folks what talk about hifalutin Spiritualism. My spirit friends learns me all I wants to know."

To replace such "stuff" may we have a Cassadaga "Slogan"—"Intelligence is the Savior of Man and the Joy in Heaven." W. WINES SARGENT.

THOUGHTS ON SOME PRIMARY REQUISITES

To Install Spiritualism in the Lives and Thoughts of the People.

Four years' official association in the attempt at organized effort in Spiritualism; the opportunities afforded for observing the work; a careful student of press symposiums and platform teachings; experience in secretary and missionary effort, prompt me to the following expressions and suggestions relative to the subject heading this article.

Certain axiomatic propositions must be conceded that the reader and writer, jointly, think to one purpose. First: That system for successful effort is requisite in all endeavors. Second: That Spiritualism is a formative science, i. e., degrees of truth sensed by a large class of individuals as resulting from occult operative principles in nature called spiritualistic. Third: That Spiritualism is a philosophy in that it deals with principles pertaining to the divine and human, producing the truths sensed. Fourth: That it is a religion or has a religious ultimate in that it seeks the higher wisdom, virtue and possibilities of man in his relations to self, kin and the creative powers.

This so-called modern school of thought and demonstration has reached the second period of evolvement. When it was a child it spake as a child, but now that it has grown it must put away childish things. It is not my purpose nor desire, at this writing, to make special criticism of past spiritual work. If past pointed criticisms have served no purpose, none can be served in that way.

The Cause has come to the parting of the way where a greater degree of terrestrial methods of erudition and evolvment must be installed. To delay this installation will be to finally erase Spiritualism as a distinct school from the list of sciences, philosophies and religions. The truth possible to come and be applied from this special prediction will still rest in the cosmic sea of truth laden with barnacles of tradition to the deprivation, sorrow and suffering of higher manhood and to the shame of the truthseeker in this special line.

Quite frequently the last decade individuals have sensed the standard to which Spiritualism should be advanced and entered heart and soul for its consummation, only to weary of the meager response in its behalf; finding no general desire for a broader concept and application of its truths, and but little to hope for in that respect.

I could name at least a score who have thus ceased the quest and who can ill be spared from the movement. Other able advocates, who, from sheer non-support, or age, soon will be obliged to retire. With no present prospect of a number of young men and women taking up the line of work, the situation certainly is serious, and hysteria would be excusable in old workers who have exhausted their vitality in giving cheer and comfort to the sorrowing, finally to suffer and be sad from neglect and poverty in the closing days of life.

The pioneer Illuminati did great initial basic work. Swedenborg, Davis, Mrs. Richmond and a few more spake with the purity of and "became as little children" in voicing a high, significant expression of the spirit. Sufficient predication is recorded in the works of Andrew Jackson Davis for analysis, synthesis, amplification and application by the ablest minds during the 20th century. The output of his early mediumship could well be the text or bible of the spiritual dispensation which came in the nineteenth century. Now, it seems, and backed by good reasons, the only thing that can be done in a broad sense is to annually resolve, resolve and resolve that which should be done. It is not difficult to sense that which insures meager or no result.

There is little use of spasmodic missionary effort when the essential principles of Spiritualism are so little apprehended by the greater number of those who attempt to lead and to be teachers.

There have been many foolish attempts to organize lyceums, often in cities of large populations, where scarcely one could be found to teach elementary spiritual science, intelligently, interestingly to the young. Yet we marvel at lyceum failures! Of the twenty Spiritual societies organized by the New York State Association of Spiritualists the first year, but a few survive, and the greater number ceased associate effort a few months after organization.

As chairman of the Missionary Committee several appeals came to me of this character: "We are not able to keep up interest and unless some one is sent to aid us, we soon must disband."

It should not be necessary to repeat, for it has been demonstrated over and over again, that you cannot build nor sustain an associate body of would-be Spiritualists on simply physical manifestations, or on crude unlettered psychic expression. One must have time, talent and energy to waste to persist on this basis alone.

The object of this writing is to emphasize the necessity of coming to the aid of Mr. Moses Hull in the proposed school in Wisconsin, and to make suggestions along other educational lines.

The educational processes requisite in every branch of knowledge are no less requisite in Spiritualism, forsooth, spirits commune. They may need be of special exceptional character; yet, in the main, Nature's procedure cannot be changed. Evidences multiply where subject matter expressed in, at least, semi-normal state, is superior for practical beneficence, to expressions on the same subject by the same medium in trance state—the apparent real, squared with the ideal expression of spirit by the offices of mentality, comparison and reason, made strong and discerning by study, reading and research. I suspect the chaotic state of the Cause of Spiritualism is due, in great part, to unquestioned reliance on the ipse-dixit of the spirit. (Note "Antiquity Unveiled.")

Spiritualism in its scientific aspect is the science of sciences, broad, deep, all-comprehensive. The early seers gave golden threads, celestial, to be woven by us into warp, web and woof to clothe humanity for a happy terrestrial life in close touch with the celestial.

The road to the celestial is decreed by or in nature to be through terrestrial avenues. This decree cannot be ignored.

A two weeks' visitation at the last session of the Lily Dale Camp was to me an object lesson, a precursor of that which, when more fully developed and co-operated with schools of more primary character shall meet the exigencies of the Spiritualist's cause.

The system of public class lecture teaching adopted there last summer, without doubt, is a step in the right.

We must have teachers capable of teaching the elements of spiritual science in all its phases and to all classes of minds.

In our ranks are a number of advocates, or if you please Professors, who have long been diligent students in all branches of Spiritualism, who are capable of teaching teachers, and whose worth should be specific, focal, that their strength of thought and analysis may manifest in future workers in the field.

This was shown in the special work of Profs. Lockwood and Wright on the occasion named. It is significant when a Spiritualist lecturer of twenty years' experience says: "I have learned more of spiritual science the last three weeks than during the past three years in all my study and research.

The province of National and State Association boards is supervisory, administrative, executive and not specifically educational. Unless there be established a graded educational system in Spiritualism with which these boards can come in touch, there is no adequate reason for them to be.

There are but two paths of procedure open for lifting Spiritualism to its proper plane—voluntary education or legislative mandate. To one in suburban life and experience this alternative may seem harsh; quite otherwise with one of urban experience. The columns of some New York City Sunday papers make plain the reason for scant affiliation of men of repute with Spiritualism in this city. Where the advocacy should be ablest, strongest, it is comparatively weakest. The opportunity is not with those who are capable to meet and controvert the sub-conscious or sub-liminal hypotheses which are in the ascendent and meet with no special challenge.

By voluntary education I mean a movement on the part of Spiritualists to eliminate fraud, frivolity, illiteracy and egoistic monstrosities by an educational system of development and discipline, literary culture, aid for true, pure, psychic development, and establish a minimum qualification as necessary to be a public demonstrator of psychism, or a ministrant in the Cause. Or in case of no heed given to these wise provisions, cease sheltering fakirs by petitioning legislatures to omit doing that which Spiritualists themselves should do.

It would seem no one interested in the advancement of Spiritualism should withhold aid or object to see provided ways and means that our best thought may mingle with other advanced thought of the day; that our best scientific exponents be sought by thinkers and receive at all times a respectable learned hearing.

With this necessarily long preface I trust the management of the same will pardon the following

OPEN LETTER OF SUGGESTIONS

to the Cassadaga Lake Free Association as follows:

Incorporate an annex to the present corporation, to be known, say, as "The Cassadaga Institute of Spiritual Sciences," embodying among others, the following features:

A Chair, or Professorship of Comparative Religions, which would have to do with the relations of the modern Spiritual hypothesis to all past and current bibles and religions.

A Chair of Electric and Magnetic Sciences to enunciate their relations to the Spiritual Hypothesis. For the same purposes, a Chair of Physiology and Phrenology. A Chair of Mediumship. A Chair of Logic, Elocution and Music. The combined Chairs or Professorships to constitute a Board or Committee on Literature for selecting and grading the output of pamphlet and other form literature for yearly courses of reading.

This presupposes individual membership course-reading and also that which would be a sustaining feature for the Institute, the establishment of a system of "Cassadaga Institute Circles." That the summer sessions at Lily Dale be from July 1 to September 15, and that there be a Cassadaga Institute course of about twenty popular lectures in New York City weekday evenings in the fall and winter months as the "Circle" system would warrant.

Some of the above suggestions will recall to mind the methods instituted in 1878 by the Chautauqua Association, which has been an efficient educational scheme in many States and not confined strictly as denominational.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Stella A. Keyes writes from Worcester, Mass.: "The People's Spiritualist Society holds its usual successful meetings, and the the lecture was very fine, given by Mrs. Belcher, of Marlboro. Tests followed and were mostly recognized. Mrs. Milton, of Camb-Port, will be with us next Sunday, and her article reading is very accurate."

G. W. Kates and wife, N. S. A. missionaries, will jointly with Thomas Grimshaw, hold anniversary services in St. Louis, Mo., March 30 and 31. They desire missionary appointments in Missouri during April. Localities should apply at once, so they can arrange their route. Address them until March 20, care John W. Ring, 2011 Ave. N ½, Galveston, Texas.

H. E. Pomeroy writes: "Spiritualism is the only cult that a person can hitch to in this world and not be disappointed, for it claims that there are lying spirits in this world and the next. We shall be pleased with the change to Petersilea again."

J. A. Bee, of Parkersburg, W. Va., has found a handful of old Spanish coins in a remarkable manner. He dreamed that a ghost of a murdered peddler appeared to him and bade him follow. He followed the ghost, and after crossing the Little Kanawha River and going in all seven miles the ghost pointed out to him in a secluded spot a pot of gold and silver coins. The specter told him he would there find hidden treasure. When Bee awake the dream seemed so realistic and impressed him so deeply that he followed the same course he had taken in his dream and found everything as it had appeared during the night. When he reached the spot he found a number of old Spanish coins and several pieces of what he thinks is gold ore. He has exhibited the coins and ore, but refuses to disclose the spot. He will have the ore assayed, and if it is good he will try to buy the property.—Chicago American.

Telepathic photography is the latest fad of the novelty-seeking elite of Paris, France. By it photographs are taken of thought, of brain waves, of the absent and of the dead. The high priest of the new photography is Dr. Baraduc. In order to photograph the absent or dead it is necessary for the subject to concentrate his thought very intensely upon the individual to be photographed. The greater the intensity the clearer will be the photograph. The impression is conveyed to the plate, not by materialistic means, but by intense thought, and the exteriorized plate must be highly sensitive. Among Dr. Baraduc's collection of telepathic photographs is one of a child long dead, taken from the brain of the sorrowing mother. Dr. Baraduc has also an excellent photograph of an eagle, taken from the brain of a person who thinks often and intensely about that bird. It is easy to take the photographs of absent sweethearts from the brains of girls in love. These most distinct photographs Dr. Baraduc calls "psychomanes." He says that whether or not an image can be projected depends on the intensity of the concentration of one's thought.—New York Journal.

It is likely that relatives of Dr. Archambault, of 97 Lee avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., who died a week ago last Sunday, will contest his will as the result of some peculiar incidents which took place before his death. Dr. Archambault died on January 12 and three days before he seemed to have a premonition of his end. He called on three physicians and asked them to examine his mental condition. After the examination he entered the house and told his friends who were gathered in the place, that he felt his death was near and he wanted to make a will. He was referred to a law firm where he had a will drawn up. Then he went to the home of his married daughter, Mrs. R. C. Pahl, and told her he had only a short time to live. Two days after this, on returning home, he had a small urn with him and meeting the same daughter, he said to her: "I am about to die. Have my body cremated and put my ashes in this urn." The doctor sat down in a chair and before he began to realize what was going on he died.—St. Louis Star-Sayings.

Rev. T. W. Woodrow writes from Wellington, Kansas: "I desire to open correspondence with secretaries of Spiritualist camps with the view of making arrangements to serve on their platforms at camps this season."

The Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette says: "G. W. Kates and wife have been holding a series of meetings in the hall at the corner of Tenth and Center streets. Mr. and Mrs. Kates are national missionaries and organizers, and are en route to Texas for a canvass of that state. Mrs. Kates gave an interesting and fluent lecture Sunday night upon 'Spiritualism as a Religion.' She argued that Spiritualism is identical with primitive Christianity and quoted the Bible in proof. She followed by describing spirits and locating them to the proper persons. The meetings closed Sunday evening, when a local society was organized, to be known as The First Spiritualist Association of Little Rock, Ark. It is to be chartered by their National Association, with all the legal power as a church. The officers elected are: Ben. F. Campbell, president; W. A. Rollins, vice-president; Mrs. Gustie Kinnan, secretary; J. H. Noon, treasurer; Mrs. S. A. Leonard, Mrs. Ella Campbell and Mrs. Caroline Rollins, trustees. An early effort will be made to hold meetings with engaged speakers and mediums of prominence."

There was a large gathering of Spiritualists in Cadet Hall, on Market street, Lynn, Mass., on February 12, delegations being in attendance from Haverhill, Newburyport, Malden, Stoneham, Salem, Methuen and Boston, as well as from less important places on the Massachusetts map. The meting was conducted under the auspices of the Lynn Spiritualists' Association, the exercises opening with an address of welcome by Dr. Caird, whose remarks were followed by singing. Miss Lizzie Harlow was then introduced. She was received with rapturous applause, and her address on "Union and Organization" won for her the warmest approval. She was followed by Dr. Cate, president of the Haverhill Spiritualists' Association, and Mrs. Carrie Hatch, of Boston. Mr. Snow, of Malden, was the next speaker, and at the close of his remarks he recited Miss Lizzie Doten's beautiful poem entitled "The Living Words." Mrs. Robinson, of Stoneham, spoke briefly upon the success of the day, congratulating the Lynn society. She was followed by Mrs. A. S. Pettingill, of Malden. Mrs. May Pepper responded to a call, speaking earnestly for Spiritualism and united work. Mrs. Eliza Douglas, of Haverhill, under influence, spoke at some length upon the theme, "In Union There is Strength." Mrs. Bailey, of Chicago, was then presented and made interesting remarks on organization and practical parts of work in the field of spiritual labor. The interval between the afternoon and evening sessions was given over to social mingling and at five o'clock fully three hundred were served with supper in the banquet hall. Prior to the opening of the evening session with the singing of "America" an excellent concert was given by Thomas' Orchestra. Mrs. Lizzie Small and Miss Leone Fuller rendered a duet entitled "Whispering Hope." The speaker for the evening was Miss Lizzie Harlow, her topic being "Spiritualism as an Educator." Mrs. May S. Pepper was then introduced by Dr. Caird and one of the most wonderful seances that she has ever conducted here followed.

Georgia Gladys Cooley writes: "I will be able to serve societies week nights, in close vicinity to Pittsburg, Pa., during the month of March. Address in care of General Delivery."

Prof. J. Madison Allen and Mrs. M. Theresa Allen are continuing their good work at Springfield, Mo., as regular speakers of the South Side Spiritualist Society. They will answer calls for camp work the coming season anywhere.

B. F. Denlston writes from Ohio: "Enclosed find express order for $1.25 for which kindly send me The Progressive Thinker for another year and 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.' When I get this last book I will have the entire set of premium books, and I cannot find words with which to thank you properly for them. The Progressive Thinker is the best spiritual paper published, and I believe it grows better with each issue."

G. W. Kates and wife had very successful meetings in Cincinnati, O., February 2, 3 and 4; Evansville, Ind., 6, 7, 9, 10 and 11; in Mt. Vernon, Ill., 12. They went to Little Rock, Ark., for 14, 15 and 16.

Thos. A. White writes from San Diego, Cal.: "The Progressive Thinker of this date has devoted a large amount of interesting reading matter concerning the question whether Spiritualism is a religion or not. The great Roman Catholic church and the Protestant church have defined religion. It is generally admitted by 'we the people' that these churches are religious institutions. Now if these societies represent religion, Spiritualism is not a religion; it is something better."

Mrs. R. C. Simpson, formerly a prominent medium of Chicago, is now at Centralia, Wash. It was reported that she had passed to the spirit realms—a mistake, we are glad to know.

Letters will reach Mrs. Maude Lord Drake, by addressing them to her at 2035 Washington street, St. Louis, Mo.

D. A. Richardson writes from Hicksville, Ohio, expressing the opinion that the N. S. A. should send out trumpet mediums. He will open his house for a good medium, and do the advertising free.

J. E. Walker writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "I wish to inform the public through the medium of your valuable paper that the old Briggs Park Camp Association will not hold camp-meetings at Briggs Park this year, but that the camp will be run under the auspices of the Briggs Park Spiritualist Camp-Meeting Society, Nath. D. R. Walker, president; Wm. McDonald, vice-president; Wm. Klasser, secretary; J. E. Walker, treasurer and manager. We are taking charter members and expect to have at least two hundred members before camp opens, which is June 29th next, closing on August 10th, on which last named date a permanent organization will be formed. We have engaged some of the very best talent, and have every prospect of making this the greatest camp ever held in Michigan. We are organizing this camp for the purpose of making it permanent; have a term lease of the grounds, with privilege to purchase. We wish to correspond with good, pure, true mediums, those who have moral stamina enough to live true to the cause they represent; none others need apply, as we will not tolerate any misconduct upon our grounds. We love those who are living monuments of the truth they represent, and feel sorry for those who are morally weak, and will do anything in our power to help them, but do not feel that we can sacrifice the cause we love so well, to uphold those who will make no effort to uphold themselves. To those noble souls who are in the cause of Spiritualism as true teachers of the great and beautiful philosophy of life we extend a hearty welcome to Briggs Park Camp. Mediums always do well on our camp in private work, as Grand Rapids is a city of about one hundred thousand inhabitants, in which there are thousands of investigators. Address all correspondence to J. E. Walker, No. 326 North Ionia, Grand Rapids, Mich."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Sebring write from Minneapolis, Minn.: "My wife and self have been Spiritualists for several years, and we have received much comfort and many blessings therefrom, and we wish with our whole souls that all the human family could have the same comforts that we have in this faith. The cause is growing here rapidly. There is to my knowledge four churches or halls established here. Mrs. Manwell holds Sunday services in Richmond Hall, with attendance always good; she is a fine test medium. Mrs. Lowell is a fine inspirational medium, holding her services in A. O. U. W. hall, 209 Central avenue. Dr. A. M. Wheeler is holding forth in K. P. hall, Masonic Temple, every Sunday night; he has a large audience. We have taken The Progressive Thinker for some time and we enjoy its contents immensely."

B. Franklin Clark writes: "I have been reading spiritual literature nearly all my adult life, but I do not remember of anything more educational and useful than your Suggestive Symposium in The Progressive Thinker. It is an Encyclopedia. I would like to see it in a pamphlet with your Divine Plan for subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker and the books you give and a list of other good books. It would pay in a business way, and be a good missionary. I would like to help circulate it, as that is my religion. Like Thomas Paine, 'The world is my country, to do good is my religion.' Agencies in societies for books and papers are the best missionaries, where the agent can make a little profit."

H. E. Pomeroy writes: "I have read with some interest many of the replies to your query whether Spiritualism should be classed as a religion or as a science? Among the many, I find only one that sounds the key-note for me, and that is by George A. Bacon, Washington, D. C."

C. E. Quinlan writes from Evanston, Ill.: "Our first meeting, Saturday evening was a great success. Everyone expressed themselves as very much pleased. Mrs. Elmo's psychometric readings from articles were remarkably correct. We call ourselves the North Shore Psychic Club."

J. M. Holladay writes from Council Bluffs, Iowa: "We have just had a spiritualist Pentecost here. Mr. and Mrs. Bledsoe, of Nebraska, concluded a three-night engagement last evening, giving a test circle after the lecture. These meetings were attended by full houses."

W. R. Cooper, of Chicago, writes: "Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science? While all the articles that have been written on the subject are of a masterful nature, showing deep thought and a consideration for the welfare of the cause, I would offer a suggestion, one which seems to my mind the most reasonable under existing circumstances, and where we can all meet on common ground. Let all public meeting places bear the title, Spiritual Temple, and in our incorporation, let it be understood that we know that spirits return to earth and manifest with superior intelligence; that we have it from them that there is no death; that life is eternal after so-called death; that we know they materialize; that we know they speak and write to men of earth, and produce other phenomena. Our object is the upliftment of mankind, and to promulgate the above truths as we know them to exist, that spirit return and manifestation is a fact beyond all question of a doubt. I consider one of the most important things in my life, is to be able to be a subscriber to The Progressive Thinker, and the possessor of that book of books, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands."

J. Madison Allen and M. Theresa Allen write from Springfield, Mo.: "We are able to report very favorable results from our labors in this Queen City of the Ozarks. We are receiving the most respectful consideration from press and people. Our Sunday meetings and society work continue harmonious; our message meetings and class work, Silver Chain circles and monthly 'Messenger' are bearing fruitage of the spirit, while our ladies' club, the Spiritual Sorosis, is very much enjoyed and has fully justified its formation. Our young folks recently held a musical, literary and social entertainment which passed off delightfully. The Old Folks' Industrial Club should, however, be credited with having provoked the large audience to the greatest amount of unrestrainable mirth, by its grotesque efforts to pursue its various avocations to the tune, 'John Brown's Body,' very slow at first, and gradually accellerando to lightning speed. The noted mental medium, Louis Schlesinger, has been in town about a wook. He was present last Sunday evening, and followed the discourse with some fine illustrations of his remarkable gifts."

Christine Cooper writes from Clinton, Iowa: "The Philosophical Society of Spiritualists and its many friends enjoyed a spiritual feast during the brief engagement of H. D. Barrett, on Feb. 4, 5 and 6, and many were the expressions of regret that he could not remain with us longer. Especially did we regret his being called home on account of the serious illness of Mrs. Barrett. We shall hope and pray for her a speedy recovery, and trust that Mr. Barrett will soon be able to continue his work as a missionary, for such he really is, and one that all Spiritualists can well be proud of. We as a society feel that we are doing a good work in presenting Spiritualism in its proper light. Our president, Mrs. Emma J. Knowles, who has served the greater part of the winter as our speaker, will continue her services for the coming month. While a new worker in this line, we predict for her a bright future, as her lectures are equal, if not superior, to some of our prominent speakers."

Allen M. Blanchard writes from the National Military Home, Ohio: "But didn't your circular (Symposium) letter awaken profound echoes? Certainly you were born an editor, and with your finger on the public pulse."

P. Pearson writes: "Spiritualism is not a religion; neither is it a science, yet it is both. Spiritualism is: All things unto all men. This proposition can not be successfully contradicted by anybody."

A. M. Rich writes from Maine: "To my mind, Spiritualism presents the only proof of immortality. If it can be shown that all the supposed communications from departed human beings are not what they purport to be, but can be explained and accounted for on other grounds, then we are completely in the dark, and all speculation on the subject of a future life is of no account. There are so many conflicting statements claiming to be from departed human beings that it causes doubt as to the trustworthiness of any of them. I have just read in the Boston Globe that Camille Flammarion is said to have renounced Spiritualism after having sworn by it for ten years. If the report be true, he must have come across stubborn facts which to his mind discredits the theory of spirit communication. It would be extremely interesting to know what has caused his change of opinion, and how he explains the various phenomena that has made Spiritualists of so many thousands of mankind, himself included."

Jacob Baker writes: "Feb. 16, Edgar W. Emerson lectured at Derry, N. H. Hall was filled to overflowing. Feb. 21, G. L. Baker of Boston, gave a public benefit circle, and on Sunday, Feb. 23, was the speaker and medium of the day. We hope to keep him with us."

Frank T. Ripley closed his four months' engagement at Columbus, O., on Feb. 23, at the West Side Spiritualist Church. He goes from there to Wheeling, W. Va., for March. He can be engaged to give platform tests for April and May. Address all letters to 48 West Rich street, Columbus, Ohio, for February. Address him for March, at Wheeling, W. Va., care of General Delivery.

C. H. Toler writes from Marietta, O.: "I was charmed by the splendid symposium in The Progressive Thinker. All seem to me to be so strong and comprehensive along their different lines of thought. While reading the whole thing I was carried along on a high wave of most delightful enchantment. I am now almost 70 years old, and financially very much the poorest Spiritualist in all this 'neck of the woods;' but I love true, up-to-date Spiritualism, and shall continue to send you all the subscribers I can as long as I remain on this side of the veil."

S. W. Gould writes: "Your symposium is extensive, with a good variety of opinions. The reader can 'pay his money and take his choice.' My experience is that it is difficult to keep up a society as a child of the N. S. A. Our strongest men will not join; do not want to be bound by any declaration of principles. A society, free and independent, could succeed much better in this locality. We are subject to change as we develop."

Mrs. Gehring, the slate-writing medium, is now in the city, at No. 6311 Parnell avenue.

Samuel Phelps writes from Lake Helen, Florida: "I have spent five seasons previous at the Southern Cassadaga camp-meeting, located 1½ miles from the little hamlet of Lake Helen village and lake, in a romantic and beautiful section of pine rolling land on the border of Colby Lake. The camp for this season opened three weeks ago for six weeks' duration. I came here three days ago, and there were interesting services yesterday (Sunday, Feb. 16), consisting of an address by Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing, in the morning (who is always welcome), and Prof. W. F. Peck, of St. Louis, Mo., in the afternoon, delivered an address in his usual vigorous style. Among other acceptable workers here are J. Clegg Wright, inspirational lecturer, and Mrs. Bartholomew, trumpet medium, and others. The attendance is good."

Elliot Wyman writes from New Hampshire: "Your Symposium as replied to in the last issue of The Progressive Thinker, seems to prove simply, the individuality of opinion: That Spiritualism is and is not a religion; that it is and is not a science; that it is neither; that it is both, etc. Now as long as it is evident that each one honestly differs in opinion and belief on these and other points, where is the benefit of keeping such questions constantly before the public in agitation? The candid investigator is not attracted to Spiritualism by reading the conflicting views of Spiritualists, as publicly expressed; but the all important question sought is this: Is Spiritualism true? Can and do our departed friends communicate to us through right and honest mediums? Such a belief, and that all our acts and deeds in earth life will tell for our welfare or otherwise, when we shall have passed over the river, and that with just such characters as we have formed for ourselves here we will carry to the life beyond, will cause us to try to do the best we can in all things. Therefore, true Spiritualism is ennobling in its tendency and happifying in its anticipation. Because finite man cannot comprehend the whole problem of force or matter is no good reason why we should not be content with the sure knowledge we have."

Will C. Hodge is at the New York House, San Diego, Cal. He writes: "I am not in the Symposium, but will just whisper in your ear that Spiritualism is a philosophy, a science and a religion, depending entirely upon the point of view; but best of all it is a fact."

Should any of our readers need the services of a middle-aged gentleman, in some clerical capacity, whom we can recommend, please address this office.

An entertainment will be given for the benefit of the Progressive Spiritual Church, G. V. Cordingley, in charge, at Handel Hall, 40 Randolph street, 6th floor, Friday evening, Feb. 28, 1902. A special musical and literary program has been arranged, and several good test mediums have been secured. Admission 25 cents.

Dr. G. B. Warne and wife had an engagement last week to lecture at the State Spiritualist Convention at St. Paul, Minn.

Mrs. Clara Stewart, of Wisconsin, was one of the speakers at the State Spiritualist convention, at St. Paul, last week.

Christian Science has been debated in the Reichstag, Berlin, Germany. While considering a resolution asking the government to place insane asylums under imperial control, Rr. Heinrich Mueller, Radical Socialist, said he thought that the government should take action against the "Mrs. Eddy swindle in Flottwell street, Berlin," alluding to the establishment of a certain Fraulein Schoen, where, Dr. Mueller said, prayer healing was performed at 2 marks an hour and that Fraulein Schoen had followers in the higher circles of Berlin society. Stoecker, Conservative, formerly court preacher, said that Christian Science was a product of bad philosophy and worse theology imported from the United States, and that it should be made illegal in Germany. Stoecker suggested that the Reichstag appoint a commission to investigate occult phenomena. Count von Posadowsky—Wehner, Imperial Secretary of State for the Interior, referring to this matter, said: "Christian Science and Spiritualism have the same psychological source, which I regard as quite dangerous. There are certain phenomena that impress even the higher circles of society, the psychological causes of which can hardly be fathomed. These come and go, and even cool-headed and thoughtful observers and believers therein cannot be combated by force. I earnestly warn against using the power of the state against such things." The subject of Christian Science was then dropped.

Henry Brockbank writes: "I wish to inform all persons interested in my work that I have open dates for camps, and that after Feb. 23 letters will reach me addressed to me at the Bryden Hotel, Columbus, Ohio. I will end a very pleasant engagement at Fort Wayne, Sunday, Feb. 23. I have accepted an engagement with the First Society of Columbus, Ohio, for the month of March."

Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt, who has been serving the Temple Society of Spiritualists, at Newport, Ky., during February, has been requested to continue with them for the month of March. His address is No. 10 West Fourth street, Newport, Ky., or No. 498 West Madison street, Chicago.

Dr. B. O'Dell writes: "The Michigan State Spiritual Association held one of the most harmonious and successful mid-winter conventions at Battle Creek, February 7, 8 and 9, it has ever had since its organization. In a financial way it overreached the wildest expectations of any of the members of the board, realizing one hundred and fifty dollars in cash after all expenses were paid; and if I were to attempt to speak of the work done by those on the platform words would fail to express the good work done by each one, and to make special mention of any one would do injustice to the others, for all did exceptionally well. The board feel so elated over this meeting, that they have decided to hold a mass-meeting at Paw Paw, Van Buren county, Mich., March 28, 29 and 30, with an array of talent that cannot be excelled, nor fail to please the people that can and will attend. Paw Paw is a beautiful village in the heart of the fruit belt of Michigan, it being surrounded by beautiful peach orchards and large vineyards; and they extend an invitation to all to come and hear what our speakers and mediums have to say. They will entertain all who come, as far as they can."

Mrs. H. A. Stockey writes from Seattle, Wash.: "In the grave and solemn tones which are supposed to be very religious and impressive, the churchly ceremony of installation of our pastor was performed last evening, Feb. 16, at the Pythian Hall, the present home of the S. S. A. Mrs. Irene Smith was the victim. But dear, grand Irene has little of the sanctimonious clerical in her nature, and immediately explained to her audience that she was just the same earnest, loving worker as before, no more, no less, and as one brother remarked, she kicked the jug of holy water all over the first thing. We are all pretty well pleased to have her for our pastor, as we must have one, for pastors are the correct thing, you know, and we all know she can feed the sheep as generously as any one, and she will also occasionally bestow an affectionate pat upon the goats who like to skip over the hills of freedom better than to lie quietly in the orthodox fold."

The following letter was forwarded to Mr. and Mrs. Kates so as to reach them at Marshall, Texas, their first stopping place in that state. The letter explains itself as signifying a cordial sympathy and co-operation with the N. S. A. missionaries: "Be it known, that Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Kates, missionaries of the National Spiritualists Association, are heartily welcomed into the Lone Star state, by the undersigned officers of the Texas State National Association of Spiritualists. May you bless and be blessed. (Signed) John W. Ring, president; H. S. Bock, vice-president; Mrs. Nettie M. Wood, secretary; H. A. Landes, treasurer; W. H. Harrell, Mrs. B. Lenox, Chas. W. Newman, Mrs. F. M. Overman, Mrs. Lou Lang, trustees."

Mrs. L. S. Woods writes from Ashland, Oregon: "We have recently organized a new society of Spiritualists under the name of the Progressive Spiritual Society of Ashland, Oregon. The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. L. S. Woods; vice-president, Mr. McEwan; secretary, Mr. Loomis; treasurer, Mrs. McEwan. Having engaged a hall for the purpose of holding meetings every Sunday, we are determined to put our will and energy into the work. Our medium at present is Mr. McEwan. If there is any one who would like to aid us by sending literature for distribution, it will be received thankfully. There is a large field for work here in Ashland for spreading this grand truth."

Trust in Adversity.

How many of us when the sun shines brightly, and earth has on her summer garb, feel as though life were well worth living; but at the first appearance of a dark cloud we shut ourselves up and begin to complain. As long as everything is "coming our way" we are happy, forgetting those less fortunate; but, when our time of sorrow or discouragement comes, we expect everyone to lay aside their joys and pleasures and mourn or murmur with us!

Is this right? is it just? No, but until we learn to live unselfishly, forgetting ourselves in loving service for others, we cannot appreciate the benefits of trusting in adversity. Only by following the example of the Master whose whole life was spent in doing good to others, can we become truly happy.

By suggesting service for others, I do not mean minding their business; far from it. There is a vast difference between lending a helping hand, or giving a word of cheer to your neighbor, and telling her "you should do this," or "you should not do that." Try it, and see if it is not so.

It is the little things in life that go to make up the character. The years do not come at once, but minute by minute, aye, second by second, and if we could but learn to make the minutes count, the days, months and years would take care of themselves.

But, you say, "how am I to trust in adversity? When everything looks dark, and I know not where to turn for light, what would you suggest? Give me something practical; I am tired of theory."

First, I would say, read the twenty-third Psalm, and try to realize that it was written for you; read it many times if necessary, until its meaning sinks down deep into your consciousness, and it will not only tranquillize your mind, but will elevate you, until your troubles assume less definite proportions. Then I would say, do something for somebody. Have you children? Do something to brighten an hour for them; read them a story; if you have not time for that, ask a little neighbor in to play with them. Have you a neighbor who is sad and discouraged? Go to her, not to tell her your troubles, nor yet to listen to hers, but cheer her up; lend her a book or paper. Have you read anything that you enjoyed? Pass it along and believe me, you will return to your home realizing that

"The darkest cloud has a silver lining,
The glorious sun is always shining;
And the Infinite Father of Love
Will to his children his goodness prove."

Lovingly your sister, RUTH.

"Healing, Causes and Effects." By W. P. Phelon, M. D. Price 50 cents.

LAKE HELEN, FLA.

The Southern Cassadaga Camp.

Sunday morning early the campers thought we would surely have a rainy day, but nature was kind, and the auditorium was well filled considering the threatening sky. Mrs. Twing was the speaker of the morning, and interested her audience by a talk upon the Elixir of Life. She said the search for it had been long, that chemists had tried in vain to find it in the great store-house of nature; that the harmonized thought of the spiritual was that which needed just love. She declared that growing old was a habit; we commenced to count the years and look for grey hairs and wrinkles as their companions. Love, the true elixir, will make every line upon the face sacred to some sad or happy memory, and grey hair a crown of glory.

At 11:30 the chairs upon the platform were placed in the rear and the organist, Mrs. Dyer, of Boston, Mass., played the Wagner wedding march. Mr. Homer Altemus, of Washington, D. C., ushered upon the platform Mrs. J. D. Palmer, who conducted Mrs. Catharine Blatter, of Cincinnati, O., and Mr. J. D. Palmer conducted Dr. George Hilligoss, of Anderson, Ind.; they were also accompanied by Mrs. Greenamyer, of Cincinnati. As the music ceased, Mrs. Twing united Mr. Hilligoss and Mrs. Blatter in marriage, with a brief but very beautiful and impressive ceremony, and Mrs. Greenamyer offered a beautiful invocation, after which the bridal party left the auditorium. President Bond closed the exercises. The platform had been most beautifully decorated with pine and great profusion of yellow Jasmine that made it look like a bower of beauty. The bride was dressed in pure white, her only adornment being long sprays of yellow jasmine. Dr. Hilligoss is widely known as an earnest Spiritualist, and a fine speaker. He is so earnest and sympathetic that he finds the hearts of his audience. He is also a good physician, and a man of wealth. The Doctor is president of the Chesterfield camp, and pastor of the Anderson Spiritualist Society. Mrs. Hilligoss was the widow of Lewis Blatter, of Cincinnati, and is well known as a cultured, generous and wealthy lady. The campers and officers can testify to her generosity, and feel honored that they have chosen this spot to unite their lives. They will make this their winter home, as they feel that they were brought together by spirit influence. They will build a new cottage here before the cold winter drives them from the north.

There are several that expect to build next winter. The association has had a surveyor here and had some desirable lots surveyed; some are taken now. Mr. E. W. Bond has a cottage nearly completed. There have been a good many improvements made this winter.

The visitors have been very generous. Judge Underhill, of Canton, O., made a present of $100; Mrs. Dr. Hilligoss gave $100; Mrs. Lewis Firdon, of Chicago, took $50 worth of stock, also gave the Ladies' Aid $10. Mr. Scott Hodgkins presented the association with a beautiful memorial window for himself and wife. Mrs. Beck, of Cincinnati, gave a stove for the pavilion, also decorations for the auditorium and bazaar. Mr. Collage, of Clifton Springs, N. Y., and Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, of Lily Dale have been untiring in their efforts to help the camp. Mr. J. D. Palmer and Mr. Frank Bond gave money to purchase a small building, and Mr. Palmer has made it over into a pretty little bazaar for the Ladies' Aid.

By the way, the Ladies Aid will turn over a goodly sum to the association. Mrs. Carrie Twing is president, and Mrs. Philbrook is secretary. They are hard workers; they do not let a nickel escape them, so the brothers think.

If I should mention all that have and are working for the upbuilding of the camp, I would be taking up too much of your valuable space. You would be surprised to see how many visitors are here that take your valuable paper.

There has been perfect harmony from the start; all are working for the upbuilding of the camp.

Next Sunday morning, our beloved sister, Mrs. Kate Stiles, will lecture.

Mr. J. Clegg Wright is having a large class every morning.

Mr. W. F. Peck is doing all that he can for the camp.

Mr. Homer Altemus is giving good satisfaction with his platform work; besides he is the life of the camp. He has made many friends here.

The hotel is nearly full. That keeps Mr. Morse busy looking after his dining-room. Hotel Webster has a number of guests.

MRS. J. D. PALMER.

THERE IS NO DEATH.

They always come at eventide
After the sun's last gleam
I feel their presence at my side
When I sit down to dream,
And often in the silent night,
When lying in my bed,
I seem to see the outlines white
Of friends I know are dead.

They come and go as phantoms glide,
And ripples on a stream,
And noiseless as the motes that ride
Upon a stray sunbeam.
No omen ill I ever dread,
Nor do I feel affright,
And as they move with silent tread
I watch them with delight.

In filmy robes that do not hide
Her form of matchless grace,
Her shining hair with daisies tied,
A veil of misty lace,
Behind its sheen two lustrous eyes
Are smiling into mine;
She left our home for paradise,
This baby girl of mine.

Beside her stands a little chap,
A brother to the maid,
He fell asleep on mamma's lap,
No good-by word was said.
But I have heard him speak again,
He comes at papa's call,
He lives upon a higher plane—
He did not die at all.

ASTHMA?

If so, Send Your Name and Address Today for the Greatest Discovery Ever Made for a Permanent Cure, It Is Sent You Absolutely FREE.

A new and Positive Cure for Asthma has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Asthma. The cures wrought by it are really marvelous. Among others, Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Va., was cured of Asthma of thirty years' standing, and Mr. Alfred Lewis, the editor of the Farmer's Magazine, of Washington, D. C., testifies that after eight years continuous suffering, especially in Hay-fever season, the Kola Plant completely cured him. He was so bad that he could not lie down, night or day for fear of choking. After fifteen years' suffering from the worst form of Asthma, Mrs. A. McDonald, of Victor, Iowa, writes that the Kola Plant cured her in two weeks. Rev. S. H. Eisenberg, Center Hall, Pa.; Rev. John L. Moore, Alice, S. C.; Mr. Frank C. Newall, of the Market National Bank, Boston, and many others give similar testimony of their cure of Asthma after five to twenty years' suffering, by this wonderful new remedy. If you suffer from Asthma in any form, in order to prove the power of this new botanic discovery, we will send you one Large Case by Mail entirely free. All that we request in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you absolutely nothing. Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.
It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth; not the old cup and pitcher Sunday-school.
It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many spiritualists living in isolation, have formed Lyceums in their own families; others have banded two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the Lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. "What Is Spiritualism? How to Become a Medium," etc. In German.

This eight-page tract which I published for missionary work, has nearly reached its 40th thousand. A constant inquiry has been made for it in German, which can now be supplied. It has been translated, and published by Wilhelm Besser, at Leipzig, and I have received a consignment which I am able to mail prepaid for ten cents.

Sailor: Q. What is the fastest time recorded for a sailing vessel from England to New York? It is a matter in dispute with us.

A. The shortest voyage recorded, we think, is that of a famous sailing vessel called Dreadnaught, which made the voyage from New York to Liverpool in thirteen days and eight hours.

M. H.: Q. If it were possible for Robert G. Ingersoll to communicate, why did he not address some loving message to his loving wife and family instead of some one he did not know in earth life, in far-away California?

R. W.: Q. Why did not my spirit father communicate directly with our family, instead of sending a message through a medium he did not know while here?

A. On general principles of spirit communication a spirit will send such communications as he may find the conditions will allow, and wait for such time as will permit him to send such as it most desires. It does not have its choice.

Why would you, if you desired to telephone, go to an instrument and ask to be connected with the one with whom you would converse? If you had no instrument in your house you would have to go where there was one, and the friend with whom you wished to communicate would have to be at the instrument at the other end of the line. It would be more convenient if you had an instrument in your own home. So would it be to the spirits were they to find some of their friends in the old home mediumistic—or instruments through whom they could communicate. But if you make no effort to furnish such medium, you ought not to complain because they go elsewhere. Rather be thankful that they make such great effort to reach you.

Prof. Sanford Miles: Q. I read your department in The Progressive Thinker with much interest and profit. Although I have been a Spiritualist for fifty years, I know almost nothing of the life hereafter. Much that I hear and read is disgusting, so much so that I have concluded to seek more light, and enclose a question relating to what Dr. Crowell has called the "Wicked Heaven."

I note what you say of anarchists in the issue of December 7. How they seem to be having great meetings to welcome heroes late from earth; and are still plotting to destroy all human government here below, and scruple at no means to that end. It is also said that murderers, sent to spirit life by the gallows route, do more harm to mortals than when in the body; that evil men in spirit life, of all grades, still find it easy to influence victims and breed discontent, misery, and crime, everywhere; cranks and lying spirits are said to control mediums, to make people insane, and now and then some poor mortal is hopelessly "obsessed." I am told that "over there" coteries of evil spirits incubate schemes to ensnare good men; that they boast of success, and laugh when we weep. To, make matters worse, countless millions of evil spirits are fenced in together, dwell in miserable homes on barren deserts, are half-clad, and poorly fed, etc.

Now, if these things are so, as well-informed Spiritualists assert, I would be pleased to learn what forces are operating to redeem these spirits, to save the children of earth from the baneful influence of the lowest spirit spheres?

Are spirits in the lower spheres amenable to natural law alone, or does something like what we know as civil government exist?

A. The spirit world is governed by natural law, and by the yet stronger laws of spirit—relationship. These laws draw together those who are alike in tastes, and sympathy, as they do in the earth life, but more strongly because unobstructed by environments, and any restraining force. These spiritual laws may be said to be similar to civil laws here, yet they are not enacted and enforced by appointed or elected officers. They are insistent in the constitution of spirit, and enforce themselves. Thus a spirit cannot resist attraction to others like himself, nor can he influence or impress thoughts and actions on those who are not in sympathy with his sphere of mental and moral qualities.

Hence, to be influenced for foolish or evil purposes is a confession of joint action with the influencing force, which would not be harbored, or yielded to had there not been similarity. It may be put in evidence against this statement, that often refined persons are controlled against their wishes, to do what to them is distasteful, and vulgar, yet if their character is closely analyzed it will be found that these are not foreign to their character and are exhibitions of their own mentality and morality, if restraint be removed.

Hence it is, that however degraded and vicious the sphere where the criminal, the vile, vengeful and ignorant are drawn together, figuratively they are in chains. It is not true that they find it "easy to influence victims, and breed discontent." That they can do this is not to be denied, but it is surrounded by great difficulties. A hypnotizer now and then finds a subject who will fall completely under his influence, and be made to speak the sentences the hypnotist thinks, and do the most degrading thing if so willed, but such is only one in thousands, an exception so rare, that there is a minimum of danger that this power may be put to bad use. The spirit-hypnotist finds yet more difficulties in finding obedient subjects. It may find one, and appall the world by some terrible crime, committed by a man who has always been respected and exemplary. Why is this? So often is asked when the trusted employe falls into temptation.

The well-founded character could not be assaulted in this manner, but many are changeable, and have weak moments or fall into a passive state, when the door is wide open for the entrance of the spirits of evil. The belief in obsession, is the most potent factor in making that state possible. Let it be fixed in the mind that no one can be "obsessed" against their will. The powers of evil have no influence over those who refuse and have no longing for the gain, the profits and pleasures promised by yielding.

The slums of cities furnish a faint illustration of these spheres of criminality and ignorance in spirit life. There is also a faint presentiment of the forces operating for the redemption of such outcasts in the labors of the self-devoting missionary. In fact, there is a vast army of self-sacrificing spirits standing between their earthly relatives and friends and these pitiable beings, laboring ceaselessly for their enlightenment and elevation. They are not appointed to this task by any power superior to themselves. Their zeal for human welfare, love of friends, or charity appoints them. They take up the task because it gives them happiness.

It is because spirit-anarchists find anarchists here, ready to their hand as powder to the spark, that they have power. It is because of evil tendencies in the apparently most chaste and perfect, that the selfish and passional spirits can come near.

Thus every one may be doubly clad with armor, his own adhesion to self-control and the ways of righteousness, and the protecting care of spirit friends; and yet, dreadful to think of, there is a depth where both fail. The perverted, passional, criminal, selfish, born into their estate with the taint of endless heredity, and held in it by circumstances, cannot control themselves, and their spirit friends, like unto themselves are "guardians" for evil. Most fortunately it is that it is possible for such spirits to control so few, and then only at times! They must search long and diligently and then await a favorable moment, which is uncertain and may come only once in a lifetime, as the moment of control and the opportunity for crime must come at the same time. Let us rejoice that the just and pure in heart, if they understand the workings of these laws and forces, have nothing to fear.

How I Size It Up.

Your symposium in the last number of The Progressive Thinker was a pretty good collection of photographs of Spiritualism taken from different positions; but after all these have been viewed and examined it may be hard for a stranger to tell just what Spiritualism really is—about as difficult as it was before.

Some call it science, backed by long, learned discourses. Others call it philosophy, followed by the long blood-red record of religion. Still others call it religion, and nail it down by philosophy and science. The matter resolves itself to me as follows: Religion is a recognition of God, as ruling power or powers, as an object of reverence, love and obedience.

Philosophy is knowledge of phenomena as explained by causes and laws. Science is systematized knowledge. Now, I think I find philosophy in science and religion; science in religion and philosophy, and religion in philosophy and science.

Spiritualism, then, in the light of this, is not one or the other nor the third, but all three united—a trinity as consistent as any theologians. It is well to be grounded by study; it helps to shoot upwards, and thoughtful minds, wherever found, do so.

But what we call it, after we return from our expedition of thought, matters nothing to me.

What we do, ought to be done with the intention of extending knowledge; to open our eyes to all falsehoods and new truths; and to improve what we call humanity.

If we let this shine through in all our work, our efforts shall be recognized and good accomplished, though we agree to call it Mary Ann.

ANNUAL MASS MEETING OF ILLINOIS SPIRITUALISTS

Proceedings of the Meeting Held at Handel Hall, Chicago, February 18th and 19th, 1902.

MONDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 17.

Monday evening's camp-fire session was a success from first to last. About 250 people crowded into the little hall in the sixth story and packed it so full that Willie Cooper, the boy violinist had not room to draw a full bow-hand.

President Warne wore his usual broad satisfaction smile over the result of this, the first session of the mass-meeting.

Here is the report of the Monday night's meeting as reported by Rev. Thos. B. Gregory for the Chicago American:

"I can call spirits from the vasty deep."
"Why, so can I, or so can any man;
But will they come when you do call for them?"

They came last night at Handel Hall as often as they were called. At least the medium said they did, and the uninitiated were in no position to dispute the claim.

It was the first session of the annual convention of the Illinois State Association of Spiritualists.

It is well that spirits take up no room, else they could not have gotten into the hall, so packed was it with the devotees of the faith.

From start to finish the meeting was a lively one. Not for a moment was the interest allowed to lag. Every minute was packed full of sweet song or of enthusiastic discourse or of the messages of the spirits.

After a few stirring remarks by the chairman, Dr. George B. Warne, the audience was asked to listen to the chief speaker of the evening, Harry J. Moore, of Rochester, Ind.

Mr. Moore's address was brief, but full of meat. He told them that Spiritualism needed to learn that agnosticism, with its whole habit of denial, was dead.

"There is no more room in the world for the gospel of negation," he said. "We Spiritualists must become positive in our convictions and preaching.

"The time for fighting orthodox Christianity is past. Orthodox Christianity is in the throes of dissolution and will soon be dead without another blow from us.

"The world wants Spiritualism—the blessed assurance that there is a better life, and that between those on this side and those on the other there is an unbroken communion of love and helpfulness.

"This great truth is bound to command the world's attention and win the world's love."

Alluding without naming them to the recent secession from the Spiritualistic ranks of prominent parties in the East and on the continent of Europe, the speaker declared that truth would ultimately prevail, and that the greatest of all truths was Spiritualism.

"If Moses, and Elijah and others," said the speaker, "could come to Jesus, as the Bible says they did, then it follows that they, as well as other departed spirits, can come to us."

The vociferous applause which greeted this remark showed that in the opinion of the audience the speaker had made a good point.

Other speakers followed Mr. Moore along practically the same lines, and then the mediums were asked to call the spirits.

One after another, Mrs. Linn, Mrs. Ella Johnson Bloom and William Fitch Ruffle put themselves en rapport with those upon the other shore and waited for results.

The results were fairly good; but owing to the poor physical condition of two of the mediums and the bad air of the densely crowded hall the messages were not as satisfactory as they might otherwise have been.

Those in the audience who did not quite understand the messages that came from the spirit land were informed that they "would understand them later on."

"What we tell you," said Mrs. Linn, "is just what the spirits tell us. We get what we tell, and tell what we get."

"Yes," exclaimed William Fitch Ruffle, "and these messages are true, every word of them, whether you understand them or not. They can't be anything else, for they come straight from the other side."

The last of the demonstrations of the evening was given by Mrs. May Elmore, in the shape of telepathic readings. With her back turned toward the audience she undertook to convey messages to certain individual members thereof, and, considering the fact that she was not feeling very well and that the "conditions" generally were so unfavorable, she did amazingly well.

After a song and the benediction the meeting closed and the two or three hundred men and women went away feeling more strongly than ever before that—

"There are more things in Heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

TUESDAY MORNING, FEB. 18.

This meeting might as well have been held in the committee room, the attendance was so small.

The subjects discussed were upon the establishment of a camp and the institution of more lyceums.

Upon the camp-meeting problem there were the usual differences of opinion and no conclusions were reached. The president himself did not think the time ripe for a state camp-meeting, or for the State Association to take the responsibility that must necessarily fall upon it in such an undertaking, and he spoke wisely and well to that point. The final conclusion by the president was to favor the holding of two or three days' grove meetings in different parts of the state, wherever such could be established by Spiritualists in said localities. This suggestion found favor with the audience and the discussion closed.

The lyceum question showed by a call for the uplifting of hands that but one in the audience was connected with or knew of such an institution in the city. Harry Moore knew of one out of the city. The subject received considerable attention and the Spiritualists received a good scolding, and they took it, and deserved it, and knew they deserved it.

A flashlight picture was taken of a large group of the attendants.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

One thing the Spiritualists deserve more scolding for is for being tardy in attendance at these public meetings, but on this special occasion the president was about forty minutes late. He scolded the street-car companies. The excuse was well taken by the audience.

The meeting opened with congregational singing and an invocation by Mrs. Westlake, which was followed by a vocal solo by Miss Laura Kerr.

The speaker, Harry J. Moore, of Rochester, Ind., began his lecture by reading from the Presbyterian creed and the Episcopalian and the Adventist articles of faith that which referred to the Bible as the word of God. Text Heb. 4:12—"For the word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing, even to the dividing asunder of the soul and spirit and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." Upon that text he delivered a very forcible discourse. His voice is very magnetic and his gesture graceful, and in all his flights of eloquence his manner is that of Moses Hull; this added to the theme of his discourse would lead one whose back was turned to believe him a pupil of Brother Hull. He said:

"An honest God could not damn an honest unbeliever," and declared that no man, no parent, though he might choose to be dishonest himself, had a right to force dishonesty upon his charges or children.

He told of his own secession from the Methodist church, just when he had the opportunity to fit himself for the ministry without cost to himself, and declared that he would make honesty the rule of his life and take his chances of having his acts approved by God in the spirit world—"if there be a personal God," he added.

"Ingersoll has served his day," said Mr. Moore, "agnosticism has served its day. The agnostics were honest, but they failed to differentiate between the effects and phenomena of disease and the manifestations of power that was more than human. The message of Ingersoll and the agnostics is as a tale that is told. The world wants, not doubt, not speculation, but the constructive influence which only Spiritualism can bring it. This is our day. We have but to sow the seed in order to reap the harvest.

"Jesus Christ was a medium. Joan of Arc was a medium. Martin Luther was a medium. The Bible is a medium. Every line which refers to a man of God refers to a medium."

"Moreover, our loved ones are not dead, for since they cannot sin against God, and since they are punished in this world for sins against man, they have already gone among the spirits of the good."

Mr. Moore was followed by Mrs. Adaline Eldred, of Chicago, who spoke on "The Relations Between Astrology and Psychic Phenomena."

Following this address we must mention the beautiful piano solo by young Miss Edna Trinkaus.

Mrs. Irene Dobson finished the afternoon session by giving, under control, a few psychic readings to a tired, weary, but very patient audience.

EVENING SESSION.

After a few announcements by the president, singing, the reading of a poem, a vocal solo by Miss Harriet Case, Rev. Geo. Chaffey was introduced, and delivered an address on "The Contribution of Spiritualism to the Evolution of the Final and Universal Religion, as Illustrated in the Biblical Story of Samson." His address will be found in another part of this paper.

Mrs. Warne's address, "Is the Soul of Man Immortal?" was good and received splendid recognition by the audience.

Mrs. Westlake gave many splendid psychic readings and in a very pleasing manner.

Mrs. Josephine Ropp gave psychic readings that were very remarkable, and nearly all were recognized.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, FEB. 19.

Promptly at 10:15 o'clock, the chairman, Dr. Warne, called the meeting to order, and announced the following vital questions for consideration:

Shall we ordain mediums as public teachers?

What should be the requirements for ordination?

Who should be empowered to ordain?

What title should ordained mediums use?

Dr. Warne said: "These are matters for us to tackle at this time, and let us see to it that they are tackled with ungloved hands.

"Be free to speak what you think. We are freemen, not slaves; we want truth and right, not falsehood and error. Speak out, then, and don't be afraid!"

It was not a second before Alonzo Thompson was on his feet. He said: "In this matter of ordination, my advice is that we make haste slowly. It is not a question of ordination or no ordination, but a question of character or no character. First of all, we should demand moral integrity. No moral integrity, no ordination; that is my motto."

Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, president of the Wisconsin State Association, said: "We have men and women parading around under the name of 'Reverend,' 'Professor,' or 'Madam,' who are not fit to be mentioned in the same breath with the glorious faith of Spiritualism. We must cut them off.

"I am in favor of more stringent ordination rules—of anything that will give us clean, able ministers—teachers who shall combine character and brains, and whose daily life shall be such as to be able to stand the light of Heaven."

Others spoke upon this question, and short talks were made on the Morris Pratt Institute, and some collections were made therefor.

Said Dr. Warne: "We have had a history-making meeting, a session great and wide reaching in results for good"—and the applause rang out loud and long.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

This session was opened by a vocal solo by Miss Weems, after the usual preliminaries.

William Walker Atkinson delivered a logical discourse on "Spiritualism's Message to the World." He was not known to be a Spiritualist, but proved himself very well posted in the philosophy. He told some very illustrative anecdotes along this line. The principal revelations he thought to be the message of future life, the proof of continuity beyond the earthly existence; the perpetuity of love and good deeds and good thoughts; to be a message, like the usual earthly missives from one being to another; just a friendly or loving communication through just as natural a source.

Mrs. H. C. Westlake was assigned for her discourse the subject, "The Present Day Scriptures." She took the position that a new generation, a new age must have its new history as it makes it; its new religion as it needs it; its new Bible and its new God; that these products which come naturally and of necessity upon one generation are not expected to fit the needs and desires of all successive generations.

As soon as this lady had finished her discourse, and a vocal solo was rendered, Mrs. G. S. Lincoln entertained the audience for ten or fifteen minutes in giving tests, and the meeting adjourned.

EVENING SESSION.

The last meeting of the session was favored with a full house and was opened with congregational singing. After reading of greetings, an overture on the piano, violin and cornet was rendered by Mme Bourgeois, Joseph and Walfried Singer. Next Mrs. Sargent Richmond rendered a vocal solo, which was followed by a harp solo by Walfried Singer.

Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond was the first speaker on the program and entertained the audience for almost an hour in her usual calm, thoughtful, logical, manner, but not without the insertion of an occasional sparkle of sarcasm. Her discourse was upon "The Central Truths of Spiritualism," and it certainly was made clear and plain that she was as much at home upon that as upon any other theme.

After a vocal solo by Miss Rachel Wheeler, the president introduced Mrs. H. C. Westlake, who spoke for about thirty minutes upon "The Heart's Plea for Immortality." The discourse was rendered as only she could produce.

It was plainly discernible, after this last speaker had finished, that the patience of the people was beginning to weaken, for they had already been sitting about two, and many of them nearly three hours, and one very interesting lecture, your reporter ventures to say, the most enthusiastic lecture of the evening, had to be omitted to afford reasonable time for the presentation of the manifestations of Spiritualism by Mrs. Josephine Ropp, the one feature of the program that was holding the vast audience in their positions of unrest and discomfort. Few people departed until the last sound of her voice had died away and President Warne had told them that "Spiritualism is a truth," and dismissed them.

Among the public mediums who work in our mass-meetings, it is a very sensitive thing to do to single out any one for special comment, but the tests of Mrs. Ropp, the Indianapolis, Ind., medium, were so much above the average in quality, quantity and satisfaction to the audience that your reporter must be pardoned for saying that her tests were truly remarkable and were given with such a kindly and good-natured spirit. The people will sanction this statement.

NOTES.

The receipts of all the meetings cannot be obtained at present, but the collection on pledges and the pledges themselves, raised for the Morris Pratt Institute, at Whitewater, Wis., amounted to $555. More might have been raised in one dollar cash collections had an opportunity been afforded Mrs. Stewart to have passed the hat to the evening meeting, but the meetings are over and we have no disposition to say what might have been. The amount might not have been quite up to the hopes and anticipations of the missionary and board of directors of the Institute, but it was a pretty good start toward a good cause and will be a tangible aid to this new-born project of Spiritualism.

Master Willie Cooper, who favored the last convention with his sweet violin solos, shows great improvement.

Madam Bourgeois certainly merits great praise in her arrangement of the musical part of the program and her personal services at the piano during the meeting.

The vocal selection Tuesday evening, "We Are Passing But Once This Way," sung by Mrs. J. W. Chestnut, "took the audience off their feet," as it were, and wafted them into the realm of soul. It was not only a spiritual song but was sung with a beautiful inspiration that sent it to every person in the audience. By request it was repeated Wednesday evening.

Brother Warne makes an excellent executive officer despite any small prejudices that he may have incurred by carefully doing his duty, and the audience, numerically and by its close attention to the entire program must have been a source of encouragement to his untiring effort for the life and maintenance of the State Association.

No one with even a small amount of perceptive insight can sit at a reporter's table in a mass-meeting, such as the one just passed, and here recorded, under the drippings of inspiration of the variety of speakers heard there, and not become convinced that no articles of belief can be found large enough to cover the variety of manners in which Spiritualism is observed from all standpoints. The only one we have been able to settle upon is "Spiritualism," pure and simple, broad and progressive. Its wings seem to be broad enough and comprehensive enough to make ours the universal reform movement of the day, and that is sufficient, and the sooner Spiritualists cease bickering and quarreling over petty differences as to how Spiritualism comes to them individually, and trying to make others see it through their individual eyes, the sooner will inharmony, jealousy and in many cases almost hatred cease and our organizations as such begin more rapidly convincing and instructing the world regarding Spiritualism, pure and simple, broad and progressive. SPIRITUALISM, A TRUTH ought to be a firm enough foundation for our great movement. Let us unite and work upon that and cease farther discussion as to creed or anything else we do not want. DR. T. WILKINS.

Precision of Terms.

While the matter is up, will Brother Francis be so kind to an "outsider" who is interested in precision of language, to allow him a "stickful" of space in which to suggest that every word, especially of a technical character, have but one meaning, and that a clear one. Among the Spiritualists there are the four following distinct ideas, or classes of ideas:

1. The fact that human intelligences live and are conscious after the death of the body.

2. The fact that some of these communicate with mortals.

3. The philosophy, doctrines, "religion" or what-not that may be based upon, or connected with, one or both of the above facts.

4. Revelations made by these spirits.

Now, if the term "Spiritualism" cannot be confined to one of these, or generally and definitely understood to mean all of them, it had better be dropped and a specific term adopted for each distinct idea. Confusion of ideas and want of clearness of vision engenders verbosity and leads many of the confused to do their thinking by inundating Brother Francis and all other "progressive thinkers" by deluges of words.

"Religion" is a mystic term born of the unscientific past.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until ACTINA Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of Deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of Aurists or Physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. It is folly, therefore, for deaf persons to hope for a cure by the old methods of the aurists and physicians, and instead of wasting precious time and money and methods that never have cured Deafness or Catarrh, they should awake to the times and apply the scientific cure. That there is a scientific cure for Deafness and Catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of ACTINA. The vapor curdle ear, removing the Catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound.

RINGING NOISES IN THE HEAD.

ACTINA has never failed to cure this distressing symptom. The vapor current passes quickly and freely through the Eustachian tubes removing the catarrhal substances that obstruct the easy exit of the wave sounds. We have known people troubled with this symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of the ACTINA.

As Deafness and ringing noises are caused from Catarrh, the hearing cannot be restored and noises stopped till the Catarrh is cured, and as Catarrh cannot exist under the use of ACTINA no person need be deaf or have ringing noises in the head if they will use ACTINA properly.

ACTINA also cures Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, Weak Lungs, Colds and Headache, all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh.

Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

Two Important Points Criticised.

It is glorious. It is wonderful the variety of views and all with such earnest, sincere desire for the good of the cause. The preaching of five years would carry less education than that single issue of The Progressive Thinker. Out of all the articles there is but one I would think of criticising and this one only on two points. It is the one by Dr. Juliet H. Severance. The first point is where she says "we don't need Spiritualist homes for mediums; that there are already humanitarian homes where no question of belief is asked, and are on much grander principles than any sectarian institutions, such for instance as the Jewish, Methodist and Spiritualist homes; that the present state of civilization makes the humanitarian the superior and more desirable." The second point is where she says "we need no Spiritualist schools."

To the first point. She describes a humanitarian home as one where all classes, conditions and beliefs are huddled together in one common pen. In the spirit world, where the law of like attracting like has full sway, no such humanitarian homes exist. On this mundane plane the Jews, Methodists and Spiritualists don't voluntarily associate their living. I think if Dr. Juliet would voluntarily live with such associates as were continually antagonizing her she would be one out of a thousand. It is true that such common throwing together would make the expense a trifle less. It is also true that such humanitarian homes would require very much larger endowment funds to prevent bankruptcy at any unexpected moment. There is such a home, "humanitarian," in Milwaukee. It recently received a bequest of a hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Before it commenced to get large legacies it struggled along for years on driblets and a three-hundred dollar admission fee. Now that it has become enormously rich it has grown humanitarian enough to reduce the admission fee to two hundred dollars. In Chicago there is a similar home. The admission fee is still held at three hundred dollars. Not one of our mediums, that have worn themselves out in the interest of humanity, could get into either of these homes. The only humanitarian homes such as the Doctor speaks of, that I know of, are the poor-houses; and these will not receive a member, without admission fee and no question of belief asked, if he happens to live a yard outside their district lines.

From the way the Doctor speaks, one would infer she thinks doing good in a small way is not humanitarian; and that conferring benefits through assorted classes is not as civilized as when done in mass.

Now to the second point, that says we need no Spiritualist schools. The Doctor creates the impression that the only mission of a Spiritualist school is to teach grammar. The Unitarians and Universalists have not built on so narrow a foundation. The Christians have not. I can't think the Spiritualists so inferior. Colleges of every class teach grammar, but they make it of secondary importance to the teaching of their doctrines and principles. The Doctor says our present school system is sufficient for all Spiritualist needs, and if they are defective let us all work to improve them. Suppose we commence on the Chicago University, Yale and Harvard. I think the child isn't born that would live long enough to see them induced to teach our students our higher and grander philosophy and principles. It will not do to say that our students don't need to attend college for the philosophy, that they can get this anywhere lying around loose. Some institution is necessary to sift, classify, and crucially study all knowledge received through the new door of the intercommunication. Collateral studies will naturally be pursued.

The Morris Pratt Institute is going ahead, and is going to succeed, and all the obstructionists inside or outside the Spiritualist ranks can't stop it.

Verona, Wis. E. W. BALDWIN.

The Sea Fog.

It was a glorious afternoon in June. I had spent most of that afternoon watching the different kinds of boats going hither and thither to ports unknown to me.

As I looked out upon the waters, a silvery mist seemed to float in to the shore.

Little by little it came until there seemed to be a very thin veil, which descended from the heavens to the restless waters. So thin and transparent was it that I could see through its misty curtain the shore across the bay.

Thicker and thicker it became until it was so dense that it could not be penetrated by the eye of man.

As I watched the fog from the distant shore across the bay there came to me the sound of a fog-horn, which at regular intervals sent forth its warning to those upon the sea, that some hidden danger was nigh.

As I beheld the fog, I could but think how much like the passing away of a friend was this fog.

It comes sometimes little by little, and again it comes in so quickly and unexpectedly shutting out from our mortal vision for a short time those which we loved so well.

The voices of dear ones that you see not come, oh, so often from behind the veil.

They speak to those on earth, warning those who have gotten out of the true course by which the harbor of peace is to be reached.

So those that live in the world of spirit are ever ready to do for us on earth, that which will lead to the better way. They keep repeating the story, that death is only a myth, and that they live on the shore which is unseen by most of us on earth, while there seem to be a few who have that divine gift that at times they can behold the spiritual shore.

But the fog cannot last forever, and as it lifts, the hidden shore will be revealed to us.

Thus our so-called blindness cannot last forever. We shall surely see that most beautiful world where dear ones dwell, and when we receive our spiritual sight we shall behold some standing to greet us with kind words and a fond embrace, glad to welcome us to the home, of which they were so anxious to tell us, while we were carrying the burdens of earth life.

"Sweet souls around us watch us still!
Press nearer to our side!
Into our thoughts, into our prayers,
With gentle helping glide.
Let death between us be as naught—
A dried and vanished stream;
Your joy be the reality,
Our suffering life the dream!"

Refused to Assist at the Burial of an Unpopular Female Recluse.

To the Editor:—We quote from the St. Paul Globe of February 14:

"LaCrosse, Wis., Feb. 14.—Stretched across her barn door, her body frozen stiff, the lantern which she carried about her early morning chores still burning by her side, Mrs. Mary Raisson, ninety years old, who for thirty years has led the life of a recluse, was found at her home near Riceford this morning. Since the beginning of her life of seclusion the strange woman, who was held in awe by her neighbors, has successfully conducted a stock farm and has amassed a fortune which is hidden somewhere on the premises. Thirty years ago she disclaimed Christianity and the Norwegian Lutheran church of which she was a member. The Lutheran minister was asked to preach the funeral sermon, but refused with the words, 'She lived like a dog. She died like a dog. Let her be buried like a dog.'

"Her remains will be buried in a private cemetery by her relations, who were first to take charge of her, it being said interment in the Riceford cemetery was forbidden. Mrs. Raisson was regarded as a witch by the superstitious country people."

How the hearts of many of us swell with gratitude and joy to know that our names or lives are not associated with a religion of whose acts the above is only a sample. It is no wonder that to-day the name Christianity is not always associated with goodness and purity, and does not receive the respect of the masses as in the past, for to-day the casual observer has no difficulty in discovering the hypocrisy and deceit peeping forth, not only from the pulpit but from every nook and corner of the church; but such acts as the above are very much in keeping with the God these Christians describe to us and whom they pretend to love more than their own earthly father or mother. It may be that God will forgive such acts where they are perpetrated by Christians, but if so it must be evident that such a God would forgive any and all crimes, if only committed by Christian people.

That there are good people in the Christian church is not questioned, but their prayers and faithfulness to a personal God, or such acts as mentioned in above article cannot be responsible for their being good, but the righteous thoughts and actions are the things which develop the moral and spiritual man, and raise him above such utterances as those made by the great and good Lutheran minister mentioned in above article. I cannot conceive how a minister of the gospel of Christianity, occupying the pulpit and preaching in the name of the Nazarene, could so utterly forget the teachings of his Master as to utter, "She lived like a dog. She died like a dog. Let her be buried like a dog."

Such utterances are not in keeping with Christ's teachings of universal love, universal fatherhood and brotherhood of all humanity.

Cancer Microbe Said to Have Been Discovered.

The Cancer Germ said to have been discovered by an Eastern Physician caused great surprise. Heretofore this disease was supposed to be caused by a cell growth. Careful experiments are being made. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two month's treatment writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course. "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

A New Treatment for Deafness and Catarrh.

Bradford McGregor, of Cincinnati, O., a well-known demonstrator of applied sciences, asserts as a fact that catarrh and deafness can be cured, this assertion following his personal experience. Having suffered for years with catarrh, which resulted in very poor health and almost total deafness, his condition became such that specialists refused longer to treat him, saying his case was hopeless. Thus thrown upon his own resources, after using all known applications, he finally devised a new method of treatment based upon a principle entirely different from anything he had ever used or heard of, and cured himself with it. His hearing is perfect now, health good and no catarrh. The success of this remarkable treatment in the many tests made upon those similarly afflicted has been phenomenal, and to further extend its usefulness and to prove that it will cure, a free trial and full explanation will be sent by Mr. McGregor to any who suffer and will address him at 330 Lincoln Inn Court, Cincinnati, O., and send twenty cents to pay the expense only for registering and mailing.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., president of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement. Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds. It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has a full page portrait of the angel heroine, from a spirit painting. Price, $1.00.

"THE DREAM CHILD,"

A Fascinating Romance of Two Worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price, cloth, 75 cents. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 8, 1902. NO. 641.

PRES. HINTON'S TALK.

Explanation of the Beliefs of the Spiritualists.

Mr. Chairman:—As president of the Iowa Spiritualists' Association I bid you welcome to Oskaloosa, Iowa, and her homes. This welcome is not merely formal, but is heartfelt, and extends to each one of you as if named; it is given in the spirit of the widest charity and generosity. I am glad to extend to you this welcome because it typifies and reflects that inspiration for the betterment of mankind.

I welcome you not only as members of our beloved organization, but because I believe you to be actuated by the highest purposes, and the purest motives that the human soul can possess. I welcome you to this council chamber of Iowa Spiritualists as the incoming of a great tidal wave of progress and reform. There is all about us evidence of dissolution of systems and the breaking of idols and chains. To the lover of mankind the sun of hope never shone so brightly as at this hour. We believe that the agencies of the invincible world are moving upon the hearts of the people for the sublime accomplishment of the purposes of Destiny. The world as never before is in the travail "Where lies the Truth?"

We see in the mighty intellectual upheaval, in the turbulent unrest, under old dogmas and theories, in the bitterness manifested in the many branches of the Protestant church over things non-essential the strongest proof in our belief of spiritual return. A Mohammedan ruler from the mountain top viewed a great battle between two nations on the plains below. They both worshiped the same God—prayed to the same Divine Being. As this recollection came to the mind of the Mohammedan, he exclaimed, "Behold how these Christians fight." What bitter irony was veiled in this remark, uncertain as to the truth of their position they cut each others throats lest truth perchance be found on the other side. In no such spirit do I welcome you here; the greatest liberality, the broadest charity and boundless love pervades this chamber, and into these inspiring environments I bid you come and hold communion.

I hope I may be pardoned for trespassing a little upon the Association by bringing berore it some suggestions relative to our work. During my occupancy of this chair I have more and more realized the necessity for organization in our work. Let others fight if they must over non-essentials as pertains to spiritual living, but let us fight for the advancement of the truth, pure and simple.

The orthodox world is weak to-day, because its energy is wasted upon unsupported intangibles. The world is full of active, energetic, thinking men and women, who are weary of thrice-told tales, who are restless at the recital of Jewish history for inspiration, and refuse to sail the ocean of truth in Noah's Ark. The question is asked in and out of the orthodox church, "If the world moves—if advancement is the leading thought of the age, why should I be chained to man-made creeds, dogmas, theories of twenty centuries ago?

Brethren and sisters, in the breaking up of this shipwreck of faiths, what should the harvest of the Spiritualist be? How shall we use our life lines? There can be but one answer; we must labor, but how? The history of the commercial world during the past ten years proves that organization is the key to success. This of course includes concentration of effort. We must take conditions and use them as we find them; we cannot hope to change them at once. One strong and enthusiastic worker can accomplish much, but when reinforced by one hundred equally as well equipped co-laborers, his powers will be augmented a thousand fold, for by so great a ratio is the force of organization. Who will dare estimate the result of such a concentration of effort? Our beloved Iowa is indeed a fruitful field, our possibilities are limitless. My experience during the past twelve months leads me to declare, that there is a spirit of earnest inquiry among our people, which if properly met by the lovers of true reform will bring hundreds into this army of true benefactors. This should be the highest ambition of every true Spiritualist. When we pass beyond the veil we can expect no greater reward than the consciousness that our best efforts on this side have been for the betterment of man.

Since my conversion to Spiritualism it has been my constant joy to know that naught but hope is in its teachings. We weep at no empty grave of a departed Lord, we take no offerings to assuage the anger of an offended Deity, we burn no incense for the atonement for sins committed. Our Savior is alive and with us always; ministering spirits are constantly granting us the inspiring baptism of their Holy Communion. Before ten years shall have passed away the practical, hard headed, thinking men of the world will confess that all that is or has been known of the future of man, will have come from the phenomena and philosophy of Spiritualism. The orthodox church even now is waging a campaign against our beautiful knowledge. Why? Because it discovers its pew-holders are restless and inquisitive. The Catholic priest proclaims to his followers, "Don't think; I'll do that for you." While the Protestant clergyman, voicing the same thoughts in different words, shouts to his listless flock, "Have faith and believe and all will be well." In this antagonism we should find encouragement. An apple tree that produces seedlings only is never clubbed. It is the bearer of rosy, luscious fruit that provokes the attacks of the vandal. The carpenter's son uttered a great truth when he said, "Beware when all men speak well of you," and so I declare it a hopeful omen when at this very moment our beautiful philosophy is engaging the world's attention, and drawing its bitterest denunciation. Error, like the worm, never turns until trod upon, as long as it is not disturbed it is sanctification personified, it is aroused to activity only when the shafts of truth enter its vitals. I believe that the present time is the trying, the testing period of the Spiritualists. The loftiest courage, the grandest patience, prudence of the highest quality, and charity for man's frailties must possess his heart and soul, if he would lead from the darkness into the light. But the blind cannot lead the blind, the stream cannot rise above its source; if we would be true lovers of men we must be true at heart. Do we realize that most persons lead double lives? There is a Jekyl and a Hyde in the hearts of most men.

Herein is found the answer to the question, "Why is sin so universal?" Most men desire the world's good will, to this end they strive for its adulation by an outward show of virtue, and a concealment of the repulsive from the public view. But this only weakens the better nature, and perverts the attraction of their good ministering spirits, that would otherwise constantly help and guide. So I repeat, our lives must be harmoniously good, if we would be upbuilding in our inspirations. Evil guides, evil ministrations, and evil leading can find no resting place within us if we think less of the world's opinions, and strive to attain a high standard of personal purity of life and purpose; then and not until then will our lives shine like the stars of the firmament, and men will be known to us. Creeds never saved men nor never will. What man is, not what he professes to be, must ever be the standard of his measurements.

Christ's central thought was "The fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man." This is enough for us as well, if we live within the "halo" of this living spiritual reflex, our lives will cease to be influenced by wrong and error, the Mr. Hyde will be cast out and the good remain. My friends, I assume it is the sincere and earnest desire of all to accomplish good to our fellow-men, for the good they will receive, not for any glorification to ourselves. What would be our mode of warfare, what weapon shall we use, what means shall we adopt to win men to us? I have said before we must be above reproach in our private lives; this is the first pre-requisite, without this we are as sounding brass. All great reforms have had their false teachers. Our beloved philosophy is no exception to this rule. Spiritualism has had its Judases and its Peters; without the genuine coin none would attempt to counterfeit. The past fifty years has fairly wreaked with fraudulent mediums and alleged manifestations of phenomena that were as foreign to truth as light is to darkness. Since our beautiful philosophy rests on truth, we should be unanimous in exposing fraud either in the work or worker, whenever and wherever found. The bitterness and vindictiveness which has followed us for fifty years is in keeping with the warfare that evil has waged against good since the world began. We have been slandered and maligned beyond comparison. Wonder not then many a soul has grown faint and fallen by the wayside. Wonder not that persecution has been met by the same unholy spirit, and our cause has suffered thereby. But with the passing of the years we have grown in the knowledge of the truth; we have learned that love, not hate, rules the hearts of men. We have learned that patience, reason, forbearance and charity are our true weapons. An intelligent, well-directed affection of these virtues upon the hearts and consciences of men will in due season make a new era in the progress towards the harbor of Eternal Right. I cannot, my brethren, emphasize too strongly my abhorrence of all semblance of hatred, ill will or malice towards those not of our faith. Experience teaches us that men are won and held by love's silken cord. We may overcome an opponent by sheer force, but he remains unconquered and bides his time, when he hopes to place his foot upon our neck. Jesus, our great prototype, won by his love and logic, his spirit teachings and his matchless love of man. Do we need a greater model, a higher and more spiritual example? Look into the life and conduct of this great medium as critically as we may, we discover only love for man and charity for his faults. He had no creed—nor should we. He belonged to no church, nor need we, but there was ever about and within him an halo of expressionable grace, tenderness and love. He lived in a perpetual baptism of spiritual life and development; his inspiration was from Archangels and Seraphims, who bore him, even higher and higher, into the infinite realms of goodness and truth.

When I began this paper I little thought to worry you so long, my apology is that my heart is full, I cannot close even now, without referring briefly to a feature of our work, that I trust you will not consider out of place. As Spiritualists, we feel a deep interest in the physical, as well as the moral and religious conditions of our fellowmen, to the end we have welcomed as benefactors of the race any and all who by whatever means honestly strive to relieve suffering humanity. We welcome the healer wherever found, whether he works by the means of modern medicine, by magnetism, by the laying on of hands, by the methods of the Christian Science, or by Suggestion or Absent Treatment, no matter what the means employed, so that human suffering is conscientiously attempted to be relieved. We believe in getting out of ruts if a better way is found. We believe this is genuine philanthropy, as well as true religion. We therefore view with alarm the attempts heretofore made by the established schools of medicine, by State legislation, to prohibit the healing act being practiced, except by those who perchance may be graduates of certain schools of medicine. This tyranny must be met. We must do our share in stamping out this attempted supervision of the rights of the people to choose their own method of being treated for disease. The present session of the Iowa Legislature will witness an attempt by the old school of medicine, on everyone professing to cure or alleviate disease, except by methods of its own prescribing. Measures will doubtless be introduced looking to the punishment as criminals all persons who violate the laws they will attempt to pass. I need not say I regard this as dangerous to our cherished opinions. A committee, allow me to suggest, should be appointed by you to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent the passage of laws in the direction noted. The organization that is clamoring for this is powerful and will doubtless spend all the money necessary to accomplish their purpose, I now leave the matter to the wisdom of this convention.

Again, visitors and friends, one and all, hail and thrice welcome. May this convention be productive of good to the cause of true reform, may your deliberations savor only of the true spirit of our philosophy, may your hearts find new strength and fresh courage as a result of this meeting, may you realize more and more that the true temples of Spiritualism are the homes and hearts of the people; that the ultimate good of others should be always first, and your motto ever be, "All for each and each for all."

THE SYMPOSIUM.

Some Thoughts Called Forth by It.

I read the symposium with much interest, and profit, and with some amusement. I was especially impressed by the summing up of A. B. Richmond, Hudson Tuttle, Prof. Loveland, Dr. B. O'Dell, Rev. A. J. Weaver, Dr. Warne, and Addie L. Ballou. But there are some not yet read in my limited time and opportunity. I also enjoyed a rare feast in reading the long article by J. Clement Smith, in this week's Progressive Thinker. One thing strikes me forcibly, viz: the tendency of many writers to hang in the old rut and insist that religion is limited to the worship of a god. Bro. Weaver's article illustrates what I would have said if I had not been limited in advance by the terms of the Editor. To go bushwhacking around in the Middle Ages for weapons against the religious expression of the 19th and 20th centuries seems to me like child's play. The New Testament defines religion thus: "To visit the widows and the fatherless in their affliction and keep himself unspotted from the world;" and Frances Ellingwood Abbot, who engineered the Free Religious movement thirty years ago, defined religion as "man's effort to perfect himself." But dogmatic negationists of the Spiritual School insist on groveling in the old rut, and repeating the absurdities of outgrown creeds, as the only measure for the religious ideals of this growing age. Bro. Smith's letter in this week's Progressive Thinker is a splendid analysis of the situation, and shows a wide acquaintance with the history of religious evolution, as well as the scholarships of the past and present. It is an admirable paper, and worth reperusing several times. But he seems to be afflicted with the anti-religious prejudice, though he puts it in admirable shape. He never knew a religion without a God. Well, is that any reason that we cannot have a religion without worshiping a God? I do not recall but one instance of a political party without a God, but I think there may and will be many parties without an anthropomorphic God, or any other that can be clothed with creed. But that does not make it necessary to have a God or no politics.

I suspect that if all Gods were annihilated, we should still have political parties and religious institutions.

Bro. Loveland's idea that Spiritualism is above all the great religions of the past, suits me, but that does not take it outside of religion. It is simply the climax of religious evolution, and conserves all that is valuable in the religions of the world.

I like the symposium. It is a great feast, a whole Bible, almost an Encyclopedia. The writers have all, so far as I have read them, acquitted themselves nobly, and given us a great variety of contrasts, and agreements, and analyses from their own mental plane, illustrative of the ruling authority of long cherished habits of thought.

Let us have more symposiums. The world can thus see how beautifully we Spiritualists harmonize!

LYMAN C. HOWE.

A CHILD LEADS THE WAY.

(Dedicated to Marguerite Pearl Oakes.)

Marguerite Pearl,
A sweet little girl,
A beautiful bud from above,
Unfolded awhile
And passed undefile
Back into the haven of love.

She came here to cheer
A home she made dear;
She tasted this life and away
With angels she sped
To bloom with the dead
Up there in this life's endless day.

She brightened the life
Of a husband and wife
Then bade them a silent adieu;
She came as a bright
Illumining light
To guide their souls upward anew.

Oh weep not for Pearl,
The sweet little girl,
For the angels will teach her above
Earth's passionate plane;
You'll see her again,
An angel all brightened with love.

The bud that must bloom
Beyond the dark tomb
Unfolds its bright petals of life
Where culture is free,
And right has to be
The motive for labor and strife.

ANOTHER APPEAL

For the Morris Pratt Institute.

There is a large body of liberal, progressive truth that the world needs to know, which is not the especial property of Spiritualism, but which it is within the province of the Spiritualist to teach.

There is also a large body of error, of ignorance, of superstition, of selfish greed, of false worship in religion and in social life, from which the world ought to be freed, and it comes within the province of the Spiritualist teacher to help remove it.

There are also many general and unsettled questions of vital importance, outside of spirit return, in which all rational, broad-minded, progressive people are interested and which they want to hear discussed.

The Spiritualist teacher falls short of filling his position if he does not discuss these questions, expose all error and defend all truth which is helpful to human progress.

In doing this work he does not have the whole field to himself. Everywhere and at all times, he will find himself thrown into direct competition with other broad-minded and progressive teachers who do not class themselves as Spiritualists—with Freethinkers, Unitarians, Universalists, Liberal orthodox, Independents, Ethical Culturists—and unless he can equal them in his attractions, in his breadth of learning, in his acquaintance with ancient and modern history, with science, with religion, with general literature, in the richness of his thought, in the correctness and beauty of his language, and in the ability to treat a subject in logical order so as to make it convincing, the Spiritualist society over which he ministers will suffer.

It will suffer because there are many, even some Spiritualists, who will go and pay their money and give their influence where they can hear the best speaking on living topics, irrespective of sect or name, and who do not care whether the thought comes from an intelligence in spirit life or from the mind of the speaker; they only require that it shall be of superior merit.

What makes it still harder for the Spiritualist speaker is the fact that many of those with whom he has to compete are more or less in sympathy with the possibility of spirit return. I know a Universalist minister, who was a class-mate of mine in college, and who is settled over a large Universalist church in a city near me. He has told me a dozen times that he was as much of a Spiritualist at heart as I, and preached as far in that direction as he dared.

What has been the result on organized Spiritualism in that city? There have been a dozen organizations started but to-day there is but one small, weak society, and that is kept alive only by a legacy by a friend of the cause. This minister has a church that seats a thousand people and the majority of the intellectual, thoughtful and progressive believers and half-believers in spirit return in the city, help fill its pews each Sunday.

I know the reader will denounce such Spiritualists. I have done it myself publicly in the city hall of that very city, but that did not remedy the matter. They still continued to attend, because the preacher eloquently defended higher criticism, mental science, telepathy and kindred truths, and never opposed Spiritualism. This is not an exceptional case. To a greater or less degree such cases are in every city.

What are we going to do about it?

There is another thing. Only a few miles from me in another town the pastor of the Unitarian church tells me he is a Spiritualist and has been all his life; that his mother was a medium and that he is a medium and an inspirational speaker in the pulpit. He wanted to be educated and enter the Spiritualist field. There was no Spiritualist school, so he went to a Unitarian school. When he graduated the general secretary of the Unitarian Conference had two pulpits all ready for him with a good salary. He at once stepped into his present one, but he tells me he has to keep his Spiritualism buried absolutely from sight.

I know the reader will condemn him. I did so in my heart, but he told me that he came out of school in debt, he had a family to support and he considered his first duty was to his creditors and his wife and children. It was hard to deny this. Neither is this an exceptional case.

What are we going to do about it?

There is only one thing we can do. Have schools of our own and educate those who go upon our platform. Have the speaking upon our platforms equal in every way to that which is found in the liberal pulpits.

Brother Pratt has generously given a school building, and Brother Hull, the president of the board of trustees, has issued a call for yearly contributions. If the school is to open next September, as the trustees have voted, contributions for immediate use become a necessity. But I wish to say a word for the future and permanent success of the school.

In all my acquaintance with schools for general education—and that has not been small—I do not know of one that has been in operation ten years that does not rest on an endowment fund. Raising money each year by appeals will get to be a old story in ten years, and if this school relies upon that alone, I may live to see it die, and then there will be before the eyes of Spiritualists in educational matters only a burnt district. It will be as discouraging as organizing societies, only to die after a few years of struggle.

I write this article to urge contributions, but in addition to that I write it as special appeal for an endowment fund, a fund to be set aside and the interest only used for school purposes.

Tuft's College was the first permanent school established by the Universalist denomination. Charles Tufts, its founder, gave twenty acres of land just outside the city limits of Boston to be held intact for the school. In the year 1847. Agents were appointed and in a long campaign $60,000 were raised. Sylvanus Packard gave his bond for $20,000 more. This struggle in raising money covered a period of eight years before any visible movement was made. Then a building was erected and in 1855 the school was opened with Hosea Ballou 2nd, president of the college and teacher of history and moral philosophy, and Richard Frothingham president of the board of trustees. In a few years Mr. Tufts gave eighty acres more of land. In the next decade Mr. Packard bequeathed to it his entire fortune. In another ten years Oliver Dean gave it $00,000. Following this, Thomas A. Goddard gave a large sum. In the years following, Dr. W. J. Walker came with gifts and bequests amounting to nearly 300,000. From that time to the present I need not take the space to specify the amounts given which range from $5,000 to $100,000. Besides Tufts the denomination has seven other colleges and academies. Tufts College has now millions of dollars at its command and in all departments over one hundred teachers and over eight hundred students.

Interest in education is not confined to Universalists. It is everywhere in our land, and never was growing faster than to-day. The Chicago Tribune, which keeps a record of gifts to schools, says that "During the past year 149 institutions of learning have been given sums ranging from $5,000 to millions, the total sum being over $80,000,000, which surpasses any previous year."

Let us now compare the Universalist body with the Spiritualist. The last census gives the number of Universalists, in round numbers, as 47,000. I suppose it is safe to say that there are at least this number of Spiritualists who are willing to go on the census roll as such. I see no reason why the 47,000 Spiritualists of to-day should not possess as much wealth as the 47,000 Universalists did fifty years ago. They do probably possess much more, for during the past fifty years there has been a tremendous increase of wealthy men in proportion to the increase of population.

Tufts College fifty years ago was in the air before the eyes of Universalists as their first school very much as the Morris Pratt Institute is now before the eyes of Spiritualists as their first school. Is there any good reason why this school shall not be the recipient of as large an amount in the future as Tufts has been in the past? I see but one thing in the way, and that one thing is the question whether the school is to be a permanent institution. In the case of Tufts the twenty acres of valuable land was considered a good guarantee that the institution was never to die. So I think we ought to consider the possession of a $40,000 building a good guarantee for the permanency of this institution. I well remember how fifty years ago most of the Universalists laughed at the idea that such poor people as Universalists were supposed to be, could raise money enough to endow a college. And the thing would never have been accomplished had there not been one man courageous enough to make a sure thing of it by donating valuable property. The millions that followed came because the donors knew the institution would last while the country stood.

I see, therefore, no good reason why the same results will not come to this school as came to Tufts. I personally know Spiritualists, who are not ashamed of the name, who could give $100,000 to this school and have abundance left for themselves and their heirs. There are scores of men and women, too, in our ranks who after putting by all that is really necessary for private use, could give outright to this school, $5,000 or even $10,000, and in some cases, $20,000.

Spiritualists who have money, why not look this thing in the face through the eyes of reason and in the light of what Spiritualism teaches. Soon you will pass on and leave your property to heirs and much of it will go where it is not needed or where it will simply satisfy the feeling of avarice and where it really will do but little good. You might as well never have gained your property as to have it accomplish no good after you are through with it. Why not now give your surplus means to this school as a permanent endowment fund? Give it, if you choose, so only the interest can be spent. Give it where it will go on forever doing good, and then you can come back from your spirit home and behold your money still active and doing work for the cause you loved on earth and will love forever.

Such a sight will add greatly to your happiness over there. You will not in coming back see your property scattered and wasted or foolishly hoarded, and with tears in your eyes and regret in your heart hate yourself because you did not use better judgment. You will come back to Pratt Institute and see in it your child, your adopted child, the possessor of your property, keeping it forever intact and using it so as to reflect honor and happiness on your name. Perhaps no one act possible for you to do will so enrich your future home.

Do not wait and trust to the uncertainties of a will. In The Progressive Thinker, Mrs. Longley says that the courts of Kansas have just decided that the maker of a will in favor of the N. S. A. was insane, and so the N. S. A. loses what was intended for it.

I cannot believe that Spiritualists are an exception to other people or to other bodies. I cannot think—I will not believe that they regard their central truth as of less value than Universalists regard their central truth. I forever banish the thought that they love money for its own sake or that they have accumulated it for the sake of having, instead of using it. Let it now be everywhere understood that this Institute for all future ages, will be a magnificent monument to the generosity and wisdom of the Spiritualists of this country and of this age.

THE CHAIR OF ST. PETER.

Proof of Its Pagan Origin.

The foreign correspondent of the Washington Post describes the wooden, worm-eaten chair in which the Apostle Peter sat as the first Christian Bishop of Rome, now preserved behind the tribune of the Basilica of St. Peter. He tells us that from the time it was placed where it now is, up to the year 1867, a period of over two centuries, no one ever set eyes on it, but in that year, on the occasion of the eighteenth centenary of the Apostle's martyrdom, Pope Pius IX. ordered it to be exposed for the veneration of the faithful. The writer further says that the chair of the Apostle was preserved until the fourth century in the St. Cecilia catacomb.

Protestant authorities are unanimous in the contention that the Apostle Peter was never in Rome. Lightfoot asserts that he lived and died in Chaldea. I go further and assert that there never was an Apostle Peter. In John I, 40-42, we are told about the first introduction of Simon to Jesus. Jesus said to him:

"Thou art Simon, the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Kephas, which means Petros."

This is a literal translation from the Greek version. The Latin vulgate differs only in having Petrus for Petros. Petros in Greek means "rock" or "stone;" in Latin it should be rendered "lapis;" "petrus" is not a Latin word.

But in Palestine neither Greek nor Latin was spoken 1900 years ago; the vernacular of that country was Aramaic or ancient Syriac. I have an English translation of the so-called ancient Syriac version of the New Testament, in which the text of John 1:42 is as follows:

"Thou art Simon, the son of Jona; thou shalt be called Kepha."

That was enough to say to a Galilean; he understood that kepha meant "stone" or "rock." But when the Greek version was made by the monks it became necessary to add: "ho ermeneutal petros;" and in making a Latin version the monks forbore to translate "kepha," which should have been rendered "lapis."

Such was the origin of the name Peter as the chief apostle of Jesus. His real name was Shemeun, to which Jesus added Kepha; and at a later time he said to him: "Thou art Kepha and upon this kepha I will build my church." (Matt. 16:18.)

And now in regard to the chair of St. Peter I quote from Bower's "History of the Popes:"

"The title of Apostolic See, common to so many, was, in process of time, by the ambition of the bishops of Rome, appropriated to their own. They had, as they thought, until the year 1662, a pregnant proof not only of St. Peter's erecting their chair, but of his sitting in it himself; for till that year the very chair on which they believed, or would make others believe, he had sat, was shown and exposed to public adoration on the 18th of January, the festival of the said chair. But while it was cleaning in order to be set up in some conspicuous place of the Vatican, the Twelve Labors of Hercules unluckily appeared engraved on it. "Our worship, however," says Giacomo Bartolini, who was present at this discovery and relates it, "was not misplaced, since it was not to the wood we paid it, but to the prince of the apostles, St. Peter." (Anchita Sacre di Roma, p.. 32.) An author of no mean character, unwilling to give up the holy chair, even after this discovery, as having a place and a peculiar solemnity among the other saints, has attempted to explain the labors of Hercules in a mythical sense as emblems representing the future exploits of the Popes. Been Twice in Jail.

To the Editor:—From time to time I have read in the columns of your paper accounts of arrest and persecution of magnetic healers under the guise of medical laws for protection of the people. Such laws have been enacted solely in the interest of drug doctors, comprising Allopaths, Homeopaths and Eclectics. Such laws have been enacted in almost every State in the Union, and are so constructed as to actually prohibit magnetic healers, christian scientists, hydropaths, botanic physicians and others from practicing. I have been arrested and prosecuted twice in my own State (Nebraska) the past six years; each time I refused to pay a fine and was placed in the county jail. At Osceola, Neb., I served fifteen days in the county jail, and at Pawnee City one day, and that with a man who was charged with the murder of his brother. The judge of the district court who had me placed there remitted the fine and I returned to my home at Lincoln.

My experience has been to refuse to pay the fine, considering that the best method to stop these prosecutions, although you go to prison.

I want to say to all brother healers, if you have not committed a crime or violated a moral law, you need have no fear of remaining any great length of time in prison. When prosecuted I stand in open court and declare that county jails have no terrors for me, as I have committed no crime, and violated no moral law, and I have demonstrated this on two different occasions by being locked up, and yet I still live and have good health and many friends in spite of medical laws and medical doctors. I practice openly the same as any registered physician in this city.

You may sometime be informed that I am again in jail, but it will never be truthfully said that I ever paid a fine that was imposed upon me for violation of the medical law, as it is altogether against my principles. Fraternally,

TRUTH IS ETERNAL.

Spiritualism Is Not a New Truth.

Spiritualism is a great truth, a scientific truth, if you will; because science, so-called, is truth ascertained. So much for definitions. It is not a new truth. There are no new truths, so to speak. It is only our first perception of an old truth that makes it new to us; truth is eternal.

When the question was presented as to the status that Spiritualism should assume before the world, my mind was made up at once. I have since read the opinions of most of your correspondents, and though some cogent reasons are given for presenting it to the world as a religion and calling it such, they have utterly failed to convince me that we should call it "a religion." That savors too much of obsolete ideas that have lost their efficacy and meaning.

That the great truths of spirit communion are not new, history and experience attests. Therefore, whatever may be our attitude before the world, in regard to the question as now agitated, we who are in possession of these great truths, should, if we do our duty, lose no opportunity to present them to a world, "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity;" and steeped in ignorance on one of the greatest, stereotyped questions of all time, "If a man die, shall he live again?"

That religion is a matter of education and environment, seems to be the consensus of opinion among all men and women, who have cut loose from the bondage entailed upon us by our forefathers, and have joined the army of progress and reform.

One thing is incumbent on us as an organized body, that is, to foster and preserve our organization, promulgate our truths, and demand from the courts, from the press and society at large, that decent respect for the opinions of mankind to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle us.

Our "truth wears no mask, bows at no human shrine, seeks neither place nor applause, it only asks a hearing." It has stood alone for fifty-four years past and challenged the attention, scrutiny and respect of the most cultured people in the world, including our lamented President Lincoln, Queen Victoria and many crowned heads in other lands.

All that is now needed is courage and liberality on the part of those who are privileged to realize the truth of spirit communion. Courage to stand up and be counted as Spiritualists, and liberality to give, according to their means, to spread the "gospel of truth" among less favored communities.

A great change has come over the clergy in the Christian church, and they are much less bitter in their opposition to Spiritualism than formerly. I say to them: "If this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God."

"Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? And if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain."—Cor. xv:12-16.

I rather agree with Clara Watson, when she says, "It is too bad that Spiritualism must be the basis for another sect."

Sectarianism has been the curse of the world, time immemorial; and as the Christian (catholic) church persists in disturbing, or misrepresenting the teachings of him on whom their church is founded, the delusion is likely to continue ad infinitum.

The church has made "a living" out of the spiritual needs of the people for thousands of years, and will let go their hold with reluctance.

While I am writing this, I again and again hear the "raps" on the mirror (a common occurrence), the unmistakable evidence of spirit presence and power. This is knowledge to me, more consolatory than all the creeds of christendom. My friends are here.

But I must not tire your patience, nor exceed the limits. I will close with a quotation from memory, of an eminent American poet no longer on earth.

"It cannot be that earth is man's only abiding place. It cannot be that our life is a bubble cast up by the ocean of eternity, to float a moment upon the waves and then sink into darkness and nothingness. Else why is it that the aspirations that leap like angels from the temple of our hearts, are forever wandering abroad unsatisfied? Why is it that the rainbow and cloud come over us with a beauty that is not of earth, and then pass off and leave us to muse upon their faded loveliness?

"We are born for a higher destiny than that of earth. There is a realm where the rainbow never fades; where the stars shall be spread out before us like islands that slumber in the ocean, and where the beautiful beings that here pass before us like shadows, stay, in our presence forever."

Then let us hope with fervency and still endure with patience.

Woman Suffrage Where It Has Been Tried.

Not long ago the editor of the "Christian Endeavor World" wrote to twenty-five ministers of different denominations in the enfranchised states, choosing their names at random, and asked them whether equal suffrage was working well, fairly well, or badly. One of the twenty-five answered that it worked badly, and three that it worked fairly well, while the twenty-one others were positive and enthusiastic in saying that it worked well. This is about the average ratio of opinions in the suffrage states among people of the better sort.

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters From Prof. William Denton, Through the Mediumship of Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER TWO.

My Dear Professor:—You have just asked me the following question:

"Mr. Denton, what is now your greatest wish or desire?"

It is this, my dear sir: To convince all men, beyond the shadow of a doubt, of the immortality of the soul; and there is a large number of us banded together for the especial purpose; and we have all taken vows not to cease in our efforts until we have accomplished that which we have decided to do.

Robert G. Ingersoll, Charles Darwin, Franz Petersilea, Helena P. Blavatsky, and very many others, are members of this band. Now we want a hearing, all of us. It can harm no man, woman or child, to hear what we have to say. Do not bring up what we were, or what we taught in the past, but listen respectfully to what we have to tell you now—now that we have passed through that change called death and consequently know more and better about that which we so much desired to know.

If we tell you that we are not dead, that we still live, it is no evidence to you that it is so. Why? For many reasons.

First, You may think the medium self-deceived. We will not say fraud, for that is out of the question in this case. Then there is hypnotism, auto-suggestion, subliminal consciousness, and so on ad infinitum.

Now any or all of these might bear more or less on the subject so that many think the evidence is not sufficient. If the last lingering doubt in the minds of mankind could be removed we should be happy indeed, and our heaven would take in the whole world. Neither will the phenomena convince all men of the truth of immortality. Here, again, there is trouble. It may be the medium together with confederates, as it often is. It may be electricity; it may be od force or it may be some other force not yet understood. When in the body I often thought about these things, that is, such thoughts would intrude in spite of all I might think to the contrary; but there is one way of reasoning that will bring a man out nearly right. It is well known to be possible for one to analyze the human body so as to know precisely the elements that go to make it up; moreover it would be possible to form a body composed of such elements; and it really might be formed, by consummate art, exactly as the human body is, even to the blood and the artificial heart to pump it through the arteries, also the valves within the veins to force it back again to the heart. I say, all this might be done. It is within the possibilities. The brain, skull, eyes, nerves, ears, all—all, everything; and when the figure stood before you complete, would you have a living, intelligent human being? No. You would simply have an automatic machine—a dead, inert mass of matter without a soul or intelligence. This alone ought to go a long way toward proving immortality. But even this will not convince all men.

A dead body, as it lies before you, possesses everything that the living body did except the soul and animating spirit. Now when that which has left the body can be analyzed, we shall have a better understanding of the soul, of the spirit, for spirit is simply the clothing of the soul, and it is the developing or growing spirit that has attracted and held matter together, as an outer protection or covering for it, until it has gained its development and growth. Of course, those who cast off the body, or die young, are not fully developed and the process must go on without it, but it is not so well. Anything which is devoid of spirit cannot develop or grow, even a blade of grass. Deprive the grass of its spirit and it withers and dies just as man's body does. But on earth you say the grass has no soul. I say it has, just as man has. It has a soul and a spirit just as man has, but the tiny soul spark, or germ, has not reached the point of intelligence, yet nerves and sensation it certainly has, else it could not die, or give up its soul and spirit, under adverse circumstances. Touch the little plant called the sensitive plant—I have forgotten its botanical name, or at least I cannot recall it just now—and see if I do not tell you the truth. As you draw your finger beneath the leaves, note how it quivers and draws itself away from your touch. It has feeling, or delicate sensation, and so does every living and growing thing, varying in degree according to themselves. No man can create any living thing, not even a blade of grass, and yet he may know just the essences and elements that go to make it up, and he may concoct a blade of grass out of these essences and elements, but there will be no living principle within it. Like the body he might form artificially, it will be but a dead, inanimate thing. Now, why? Just here is the great question—the point at issue.

Because they have no soul—no spirit. The soul and spirit being the living principles. And if the spirit forms a blade of grass, that spirit must, necessarily, be in the form of a blade of grass. It is simply the developing spirit clothing itself with matter by cohesion and attraction—that is, the spirit attracts and holds it—and it is precisely the same with man's body; his developing spirit attracts and holds matter as a clothing or covering, the difference between the grass and the man being, that the man has reason and intelligence, while the grass has so little that man thinks it has none whatever. Well, it would be a hopeless task to try to convince men that it had an infinitesimal share also, just as hopeless as it would be to try to convince one who had little learning and intelligence—one who had never looked through a microscope—that there were living creatures so small that they could not be seen except through such a glass, and yet all of these little, living creatures have a spirit and a soul, otherwise they could not be living creatures, and they likewise have a tiny spark of intelligence, else they could not even propagate their kind, and they could not recognize each other. Try to give life to even one of these infinitesimal creatures, oh man, and you will fail.

Now there are many who think that only man possesses a soul and spirit, but nothing can live which has not a spirit and soul, for these are life itself and without them there is no life; no, not even for the blade of grass, and all things, even to man, must spring from the tiny seeds which contain the living soul and spiritual forms of that which they are to be, and these spiritual, soul germs must originate in the spiritual and soul realm, from thence they must descend, in order to develop, into matter, and after growth, experience and development, return again to their native home within the soul and spiritual realm.

Now if all men could take this view of life, which is the true one, none would ever doubt immortality; they would at once perceive that soul and spirit could not cease to exist any more than matter can cease to exist, and all men now agree that not an atom of matter can be annihilated. The atoms may go to habilitate some other developing or growing spiritual soul germ, but they can never be lost.

A lady may have a great many garments, she may change them at her pleasure and appear in a new dress as often as she likes or is convenient, yet she remains herself and is in no sense her clothing, still, she is covered by it; she makes use of it; and that is precisely what the soul and spirit do with matter, they make use of it as clothing or covering. The child develops from the infant to the grown woman and is clothed during all the period if its growth, not by the same clothing but by new and numerous garments as it grows and needs them, so does the developing soul germ take on innumerable atoms of matter which it is continually changing or casting off for other and newer ones to meet its wants as it develops. Both spirit and matter are coexistent and eternal, but life, identity and form, together with intelligence, belong wholly to the soul and spirit.

One great reason why man doubts immortality—we find as we return and read the minds of men—is, that he has been taught that he alone is immortal; everything else perishes and is not. His dog, his horse, his pet bird, all die, and that is the last of them. He alone of all natural objects which he sees around him survives the change called death; he alone goes forth into a void of nothingness, that is wherein there is nothing but the spirits of men, women and children, sort of floating around in nothingness, for not any other living thing has a soul or spirit but the human species.

Well, such an outlook is dreary enough, to be sure. Never again to see a blade of grass, a tree, a shrub, a flower; never again to come in contact with an animal of any kind; never again to hear a bird sing, an insect chirp; just a ceaseless ocean of men, women and children, nothing more; not a mountain, not a hill, not a valley or glen, not a drop of water or a beautiful cloudlet; not a rill, not a pond, lake, river or ocean. O, the weariness, the dreariness of it. Nature has been following up the law of evolution and this is the result. It is like a man without a wife, a left hand without a right, one eye and the other put out; evolution running alone and arriving at last to this dreary waste of men, women and children and nothing more; whereas, if he had taken involution along with him, as nature invariably does, his spirit would have reached the beautiful spiritual world, filled as the earth had been with all the life and beauty that could be developed upon it. If he had not forgotten involution, he would find there, rivers, mountains, valleys, glens, flowers, grass, trees, forests, birds, animals; great spiritual zones teeming with life and beauty. There he would meet his intelligent and patient horse, his faithful and loving dog and his pretty pets of all kinds; nothing lost; not one single form that ever lived and developed upon the earth.

But man, as yet, not understanding this, because he has been wrongly taught, looks at his horse, or his dog, his ox or cow, and he says: "How is it that I alone am immortal? My horse and dog, and other animals and birds, have lungs and breathe just as I do. They have eyes and see, as I have. They have ears to hear, like myself. They have bones, nerves, muscles, skin and flesh, as I have. They have liver, kidneys, heart and lungs. They have a brain and sensorium. They also have intelligence. They love and hate, as I do. They express themselves—their thoughts and feelings—in various ways. They make various sounds which is language in itself. They understand each other. They understand much of my language. My dog, horse, and cat understand a great deal that I say to them. Even my speckled hen, out there with her little chicks, talks quite well, so well, indeed, that they never misunderstand her. Now, listen. Even those tiny little chicks, just out of the shell, know what she is saying. When she says, "cluck, cluck"—which in the English language means, come, come—they hasten to follow her. When she finds something to eat that she, in her better judgment knows is good for them, she exclaims with eager animation, "chip, chip, chip," which, translated into English means, eat, eat; good! If the little chick peeps, in other words cries with the cold, she immediately understands all about it and hastens to hover it, or them, for she usually has quite a number at a time, and as she hovers them, she utters a soothing, soft lullaby. I cannot exactly imitate it any more than I can speak unbroken German, but you may listen to her for yourself, if you like. When she espies a hawk, she utters a warning cry that cannot be mistaken, and the little chicks understand it far better than many children do when a mother cries out, "Run, my dears; you are in danger!" The chicks scatter like so many little mice, each hiding at the first convenient shrub, or anything that offers shelter, where they remain quiet and immovable until the mother hen calls them forth, saying in her own language, "The danger is past. Come forth."

And so I might go on. If you do not believe what I am saying, listen to animals and birds, aye, even to insects, frogs, crickets, and so forth, and you will find that they all have a language sufficient for their needs. To be sure man has more intelligence than any other animal, but the animals are more correct and sure as far as they go. How is it with your horse, my dear professor? There is a regular telepathic communication, or thought transference, between you and your horse. You have proved it over and over again. You often leave your reins loose, put your thoughts upon your horse, saying, silently, go this way or that; stop at this place or that; and your horse obeys your unspoken thoughts. He knows where his stable is and selects the right one in a crowded city's streets where there are many others. He never makes a mistake and invariably turns into it when you, sometimes, would pass it by forgetful or unheeding. He even understands when you go to sleep in your buggy and he then walks very carefully that he may not waken you or that no accident happens. If anything starts you he is startled. In fact, as far as an affectionate horse can be, he is at oneness with you.

Friends, study animals more. Try to understand their language. Do not call a vile and drunken man beastly. The beasts are not guilty of such things. They are as perfect as they can be according to the wisdom they possess.

WILLIAM DENTON.

THE PAST.

A thousand dreams to earth have come and gone,
A thousand forms, by fear or fancy drawn,
Like shapes of night have faded from the dawn.

A thousand creeds have held their sway on earth,
Unto a thousand myths have given birth,
That now are food for wonder, scorn; or mirth.

A thousand gods have reigned their little day,
And crumbled. They are fashioned out of clay,
Like worn-out toys they now are cast away.

A thousand systems of a thousand schools,
The theories of Nature's hidden rules
Now seem to us the dreams of idle fools.

A thousand lofty sentiments expressed,
To those who heard them seeming of the best,
Are now forgotten or a theme for jest.

A thousand books on memory have laid claim,
A thousand authors through them sought for fame;
To us there scarce remains a single name.

The winnower of the ages thrashes o'er
The harvest of a generation's lore;
One grain is gathered from the thrashing floor.

The rest as empty chaff, aside is cast.
Oblivion's refuse, gathering thick and fast,
Chokes all the gates and highways of the Past.

Religions, dreams, and empires all have gone,
Like shapes of night that vanish from the dawn,
While through the ages earth went rolling on.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

INFALLIBLE CHURCH AND INFALLIBLE BOOK.

"The Pope has appointed a committee to define the portions of the Bible which are to be considered henceforth as divinely inspired. This decision is the outcome of a book written by Father Gerard, a French priest living at Constantinople, who contended that the Biblical story of the Garden of Eden was merely a fable current among the Jews. The appointment of the committee has caused considerable surprise, the Pope having been regarded hitherto as a supporter of the doctrine of the Divine inspiration of every part of the Holy Scripture. Cardinal Parocchi is the president of the committee."

Whatever is happening to this crumbling old planet? Verily there is no stability in the world. One by one the old things pass away. The Pyramids wear, the Sphinx loses its features, the ocean bed becomes a desert, and the Pope owns that after all he may have been mistaken.

It is incredible, it passes belief that the church—the only holy body that never wavered in its belief, the one organization that never changed—has come to this pass that it intends to sum up its Bible and find out whether the head, arms, or legs of its fetish must be lopped off.

What will happen if the committee decides against the snake and apple story? Surely the Pope will send post haste to Peter to implore the release of those suffering souls who have been consigned to hell because they could not swallow the apple and would make no room for the serpent in their zoological collection.

The transformation scene of a pantomime is not more sudden and startling than the revelation contained in Dalziel's message printed above. With a breath the whole phantasmagorial castle of Papal infallibility disappears, melting into nothingness, and the whole diabolical machinery of bigoted conservatism falls to pieces with a thunderous crash.

Oh, that this enlightenment could have come a few hundred years earlier! Then had not the past re-echoed to the dying groans and shrieks of the millions of martyrs who gave their lives because they could not believe as the church would have them?

But what a cause for joy is such an announcement! Let the peoples of the earth clap their hands, for the arch-enemy of progress and humanity in his latter day of senility has become more humane—blessed be the approach of diddering infirmity. The hand which held the iron rod with such brutal determination, and broke in pieces all who opposed, is dropping the rod and taking a reed.

This message sounds the death-knell of organized papal authority. Its back is broken, the strength of its priests has departed, and its assumption of infallibility, which was the center of its force, falls from its nervous grasp.

We look upon this as the begining of the end, for though the decision upon the canon but heralded in a period of greater bloodshed, the decision to revise at this time of day means the birth of a new era of enlightenment and progress.

Spiritualists, by increased efforts, rejoice that the labors of the past are bearing fruit, and labor more ardently, that the joy of future generations may be greater than that which is your present privilege.

ANIMALS ARE ETERNAL SOULS.

As a constant reader for the last six months of the Two Worlds, allow me to say a word or two in reference to the above interesting topic. I am a thorough believer in the immortality of all sorts of animals, yet I will abstain from being outrageously dogmatic upon the subject, for human knowledge is nowhere when one disputes upon the matter. The holy scriptures are rigidly silent with regard to their existence beyond the vale of time. So, however ardently one may argue in favor of the immortality of the brute race, his reasons are discounted by the fact that he cannot refer to any inspired truth to corroborate his side of the question.

But I now write with the purpose of proving directly, or indirectly, just as one may view it, through the channels of two very extraordinary supernatural incidents that I clearly remember reading in two different periodicals years long since gone by, and if they fail to enlighten or convince the skeptical upon the matter, I do not know where one can turn to substantiate the point in favor of the immortality of animals. I write from memory. The first incident I read in a column of the Animal World about twenty-four years ago, and it made a very deep impression on my mind.

A MARVELLOUS ANSWER TO PRAYER.

A gentleman was selected by the committee of a large religious association to act as treasurer for the time being, and a considerable sum of money was entrusted to him at the conclusion of the meetings. His home was a few miles out of the town, the other side of a large forest, through which he was obliged to walk to reach his fireside. With the precious burden he commenced his homeward journey, which was an exceedingly dark and solitary one.

The way through the forest was familiar to him, so he felt no uneasiness on that point, but as he was proceeding and nearing the center of the dense woodland he espied two suspicious looking characters coming towards him along the footway. Their faces were almost hidden from view by the flaps of their shaggy caps, and in their hands were cruel-looking staves. Their slinking demeanor convinced the gentleman that they were bent upon mischief and personal injury to him, with robbery. He was in great fear, and in a keen sense of helplessness, which was intensified by the treasure with which he was entrusted.

In sheer inability to defend himself, and dreading the worst at the hands of those approaching ruffians, he earnestly prayed to God for divine protection till he had arrived safely at home. Slowly and fearfully he drew nearer and nearer to them in the growing darkness of the forest, when suddenly, a little to his left, a huge mastiff dog sprang out from a thicket near, and came to his side, and together they walked closer and closer to the desperadoes. When within a few feet of them the mastiff dashed forward, and with an unearthly growl caused the villains to take to their heels with unspeakable terror.

The gentleman continued his walk with overwhelming gratitude to his timely deliverer, and soon came to a stile that divided the forest and the field in which his cottage stood; over this he stepped; when he looked round for the mastiff it had disappeared. He was greatly astonished. Where the magnificent animal came from, or where it went to in such an unaccountable manner was ever a source of the greatest astonishment to him; but in and through it all he saw the hand of Divine Providence protecting him.

The following is an incident that I read ten years ago, in a very popular Welsh periodical, entitled "Trysorfa-y-plant," The Children's Treasury, which has a circulation of forty thousand each month, and I must confess that it goes exceedingly closely to prove that animals enjoy an equal share of immortality as the higher animals—men. But I will leave the story entirely to your judgment:

A prominent minister of the Welsh Calvinistic Church, after having a considerable sum of money given to his care by a body of communicants, proceeded on his way home over a rugged mountain. The night was dark, and the way unusually lonesome. At a halfway inn he dismounted from his horse, and ordered some refreshments, during which he conversed with a man coarsely dressed and with an unprepossessing countenance, who was also taking some refreshments. The conversation grew sociable between them, so much so that the minister acknowledged, in his innocency, that he was in possession of a round sum of money, held in the name of a certain church. The man got up and left the premises, leaving the minister to finish his meal. The minister shortly afterwards did the same—called for his horse, paid his bill, remounted, and continued his journey over the mountain.

As he was going along he noticed a suspicious looking character prowling inside the wayside hedge, carrying something similar to a rifle. He grew uneasy, and foreboded a calamity, which he felt helpless to avoid. In his terror he immediately offered up a heartfelt petition for the instant aid of Almighty God, acknowledging at the same time that he was carrying the sacred money of his holy cause, which was not his own. Presently he saw by his side a gentleman on horseback. He turned in his saddle and accosted the silent traveler in the following terms:

"Good night, sir. A pleasant night, isn't it?" No answer.

"Are you going far?" No answer.

Thinking that the gentleman was an Englishman (for he had hitherto accosted him in the Welsh), he repeated the friendly questions in English, but to his astonishment the gentleman remained stolidly silent. And so they covered the ground for a considerable distance. The would-be assassin, directly the second horse and rider appeared, flew out of sight, and was not seen afterwards. The minister was sorely puzzled at the reticence and uncommunicativeness of his fellow-traveler, but abstained from offering any more sociable questions to him. Thus they went along in the awful, yet eloquent, silence of the mountain. Presently they came to two cross roads, down one of which the minister guided his horse. He turned his head, with a question upon his lips, when, to his horror, he found himself alone on the road.

Some time afterwards the minister related this awful experience to another Christian minister, adding, by the way, "I warrant you, sir, that if I had only asked him how Jesus Christ was he would have replied quietly enough; but I didn't think of that."

Now, Mr. Editor, I ask what can we make of those two miraculously opportune appearances? I am acutely tempted to offer my opinions, but I will abstain at the present, awaiting those of your many zealous readers upon the mysterious subjects.

Some Historical Corrections.

In the prospectus sent out by the Southern Cassadaga Camp Meeting Association, also in their notices in the press, reference is made to the Library of the Association as having been founded by Mrs. Skidmore.

Permit me to say, Mrs. Skidmore had nothing whatever to do with founding the library, as all who are familiar with its origin and history are aware. It was founded years before Mrs. S. visited Lake Helen, as the S. C. S. C. A. was chartered, and was known as the Orange City Liberal Library. The meeting at which the Library Association was formed, was called by spirit friends through myself at least fifteen years before the present camp was established.

Some three or four years before the camp opened, I secured the memberships of all the non-resident members of the Library Association, as we were told by our invisible helpers the time was near at hand when our hopes were to be realized by the materialization of the camp.

Soon after the charter had been granted for the present Association, I called a meeting of the members of the old Library at my house. This meeting was attended by nearly all of the resident members of the Association. At said meeting Mr. and Mrs. Giddings and myself were appointed a committee to turn the books over to the Camp Association, and Mrs. Giddings was instructed to prepare a sketch of the origin of the library, its history, etc., to be given with the books into the keeping of the new institution.

The Association had no suitable place to keep the books, nor money to purchase material to erect a building. W. S. Kady and myself made an estimate on a building which we thought would answer the purpose for a few years, and found the material would cost about $25. A thought came to my mind, the result of which tells how the Library came to bear Mrs. Skidmore's name.

I went to Mrs. S. and said to her: "If we will name the street next to the park Marion street, and the library Marion Library, will you give us the money to put up a building, if it does not cost more than $25?" She hesitated a moment, then said: "Yes, I will, but I could not give any more than that." Acting on that promise, I at once made out the bill for the lumber and sent it to the Bond Lumber Co., who filled the order. A friend donated the use of his horse, and I hauled the material from DeLand, seven miles distant. The building was put up gratis, the work being donated by carpenters who were at work on the camp ground.

Soon as the building was completed, Mr. Giddings and I went to his house where the books were stored, got them and took them to the camp ground, where they were installed in their new home. The stock consisted of the works of Paine, Voltaire, Hume, Davis, Tuttle, and other equally eminent authors. A very neat "presentation" was written by Mrs. Giddings for the occasion, and read by her as the books were being placed on the shelves of the new building. The paper recounted briefly the origin and history of the library, and expressed the confidence reposed by its members in the newly organized body to whose keeping the books were committed.

Mrs. Skidmore did not pay for the lumber, and after her death the Bond Lumber Co. sent the bill to Mr. Skidmore, who at first refused to pay it, but when the company sent it for collection he settled it.

To Mr. and Mrs. Giddings and myself and our spirit helpers belongs the honor of founding that library. And if there is any one person to whom more credit is due than to another, that person is, yours for justice,

A GREAT QUESTION.

What Is Spiritualism Here For?

I am not at all competent to define Spiritualism. But presumably it has come to fill a "long felt want." If not so, it has not come to stay; there is no room for it, nothing for it to to do.

Spiritualism has not come to make us more pious toward the Gods; already the church gives us a surfeit of that. Indeed, whatever was the religion of the church in its early struggles, now it is a system of piety for the most part towards the Gods. Not only must we worship the Gods, but we can have no favors except through them. Even if we want to be and do good we must do it for Christ's sake and because God commands it, and to keep out of hell. Oh, no, the church has worked that field for all, and much more, than is in it. Spiritualism has not come to thresh that straw.

Again, Spiritualism has not come to build up an organization and therefore to make good members rather than good citizens. It has not come to prostitute the Sabbath and prosecute foreign wars for that purpose. That ground is already occupied by the church.

Neither has Spiritualism come to extend the field of human knowledge along geological and astronomical lines.

What the world needs to-day is the scientific demonstration of a future life—not in a heaven of golden streets, nor yet in a hell of fire and brimstone, but in a purely spiritual system or environment. It also needs a much more exhaustive study of general psychic phenomena and its laws.

But the crying "want" is perhaps religion in everyday life, and which shows itself in our conduct toward men, rather than in pity toward the Gods. Indeed my encyclopedia defines religion as "right conduct," which goes to show perhaps that it was made by religious people, while the one quoted by Mr. Tuttle must have been made by pious people.

The "coming" religion is that of right conduct toward men—not of piety toward the Gods. And such religion, like inspiration, comes "always from within and never from without." It comes of right thought and right feeling and an impulsive volition—not for Christ's sake nor even to keep out of the lake. Of course these selfish motives to good conduct may have served a good purpose at one time, and with some men now—but not with the "coming" man.

We are here to say that unless Spiritualism fills this "long felt want" by practicing and encouraging religion in everyday life, something else will. These wants are always filled sooner or later. When the world calls for a thing it generally gets it.

One other thing the world wants, a final settlement of the God question. But it is said a question is never settled till settled right. The only chance is to have the Gods fight it out to a finish. True, they have been fighting almost since the world began—but at too long range. A god in India, one over in Arabia, another here, are not likely to do each other much damage; each has his own way in his own country. Only recently has there been in this country a free fight for all at close quarters. Only a while ago it was death in the pot to say anything against the God of Israel. And only now materialists begin to know that matter is God. We must think The Progressive Thinker is on the right track; for it encourages the fulfillment of all these "wants."

Our Dumb Animals.

"Fancy a dumb, patient, and willing animal, quivering with fear at every blow, struggling to its feet and falling again to receive more brutal punishment because its owner has compelled it to tempt the icy pavements smooth shod instead of rough shod."

In No. 639 of your excellent journal, under the above heading, on the editorial page, I find the above extract from the Chicago American, intended to emphasize your own noble and humanitarian utterances on a subject which I fear, these war times, is not attracting the attention it should.

The noble sentiments I have quoted, coming as it does from the editor of the "American," ought to give that journal a leading place in the estimation of all good people.

I have been for a quarter of a century fighting the "Horse Blinder"—the greatest source of pain and torture, to my mind, to which this noble animal is subjected. I talk with people every day on the streets who are driving blinded horses, and in hardly a single instance do I fail to convince the driver—whether a "gentleman of leisure" or a coal or wood carrier, that he not only by this barbarous appendage deprives the horse of a source of much pleasure in looking at the beautiful world around him, but in this way causes nearly all the runaways and the accidents resulting therefrom—for in nearly every instance the horse runs from fright of supposed danger which did not exist, and but for the blinder would have caused no trouble.

Then again it is the opinion of all intelligent veterinarians who have given the subject attention, that nearly every case of blindness in the horse results from the intense strain on the nerves of the eye from supposed danger, which, but for this relic of a barbarous age, the intelligent animal, reasoning as he is well capable of doing, would see no danger, and hence would make no effort to secure his safety by flight.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

REMARKABLE EXHIBITIONS GIVEN BY AN INDIANA HYPNOTIST

Subjects Hypnotized by Telephone Describe Lands They Have Never Visited.

Without stirring from one's chair it is possible, under hypnotic influence, to explore the earth from one end to the other, to behold wonders, solve mysteries, discover crimes.

This is the claim of Prof. Ivan Mc Laughlin, a hypnotist, of Indianapolis, and recent remarkable experiments that he has made go far toward establishing the truth of his assertion.

Miss Hazel Bennett, of 212 East Thirty-first street, and Louis Florky of 28 Prospect street, Indianapolis, under the guidance of Mr. McLaughlin, have recently, according to statements which are well authenticated, performed wonders that have never been equaled in the history of hypnotic science.

After being thrown into the trance simply by telephonic communication, these remarkable subjects appear to have sent their astral bodies, or whatever the scientific equivalent of that term may be, with no difficulty and with absolutely accuracy of observation, to the farthest ends of the earth.

All Indianapolis is talking of the marvel. Shortly the whole country will be talking of it. Already people are asking: "May the wonder be duplicated? Are Miss Bennett and Mr. Florky the only persons capable of performing these feats? Or may the phenomenon come in time to be general? And what will be the next development in this most picturesque, most awesome of sciences?

If Egypt may be explored by a hypnotic subject, why not—Mars? Why not still remoter, undreamed of spots in the immeasurable universe?

Following is an exact account of the recent series of experiments:

At an appointed time, in the presence of representatives of the Sunday Post-Dispatch, Mr. McLaughlin called his subjects by the telephone and commanded them to fall asleep. From the other end of the line word was soon sent that his command was effective and that several physicians were unable to awaken the subjects. The party of spectators at once went to the residence at which the test was conducted, where the subjects were awakened by the hypnotist.

Now for the strangest part of the story.

The subjects were again commanded to fall asleep, to sleep deeply, and to see clearly. A man with whom the reporter was well acquainted, was described to Miss Bennett, who was told to locate him in Chicago, where he was last known to be. In a moment she found him at the Burlington ticket office. He was preparing to leave the city.

Again she was put to sleep and told to return to the traveler, but at a point in time a week later than her previous observation of him. This time she located him at a little tavern, or roadhouse, situated in the country away from any railroad communication. From there she followed him when he was taken to Mattoon. Here she declared him to be on a certain day.

This statement was immediately verified by telegraph. Everything was found to have happened just as the subject had described. The company was mystified, but not convinced.

Another test was instituted. This time the subject was Mr. Florky.

From the office of Mr. McLaughlin he was sent in spirit to the Sentinel office, there to carefully note the actions of a member of the Sunday force.

For one hour Mr. Florky followed his subject and gave an account of his every action. If the subject went to the telephone or talked of any one, lit a cigar or made any movement whatever, it was carefully recorded at both ends of the line.

At the end of the hour the two accounts were compared.

They were found to correspond almost to a detail.

"Clairvoyance, clear seeing, is the deepest phase of hypnotism," says Mr. McLaughlin. "It is a psychological phenomenon, and its usage is always authentic, as it is controlled by natural force.

"The question that commonly arises is: 'What is it that goes forth in search of the information desired?' Everything that is said is a suggestion, and it passes through the subjective brain, or cerebellum, and thereby causes a lesion in that part, and passes into the storehouse of knowledge or the soul and the lesion permits the suggestion to return to the objective brain, or cerebrum, to be weighed or acted upon by our reasoning faculties through which we have memory. The subjective mind is all that is good in man. It is the essence of virtue, in other words, the soul. This is as far as I or anyone else can go. Why and how this soul takes its flight nobody knows.

"The Hindoos teach that by purifying the life and mind one can attain such perfection that at his will his soul will take its flight to whatever point indicated, there to do as the subjective mind desires. I work on that theory. My subjects also work out that theory exactly, but I am unable to say how or why. They travel to the ends of the globe, copy the manners and customs of mysterious people and speak languages of which I have never heard.

One night last week Miss Bennett was sent to the wilds of an African jungle to discover the fate of an Indianapolis boy who is supposed to have lost his life while with an exploring party at the headwaters of the Nile.

Without any previous knowledge of the topography of the country or any knowledge of the manner of travel, she began her description.

From Alexandria she proceeded slowly up the historic Nile. Everything was new to her and she spent much time in describing the strange landscapes, the natives, their peculiar mode of dress and their work of agriculture. Slowly through numberless villages along the river she proceeded to its mouth. Then she struck off into the wilderness. It seemed to be night.

Even in her cataleptic condition she shivered with fear at the wild and weird sounds emanating from the tropical forest. Now and then she would cry out that a large tiger or unknown beast was in her path and that the air was resonant with the cries of the woodland inhabitants.

On and on she went, now and then passing a deserted camp-fire, again crossing mountain ranges and swift-flowing streams, still on the trail of the young explorer.

The pursuit grew warmer. Bit by bit she gathered evidence that she was on the right track, until the party was at last located. But the one for whom she was searching was missing.

Back on the trail again she sped, and at a slight declivity in the rolling land swerved to the right and entered a deep jungle. There she found the object of her search. He was lying on the ground, dead. There her work ended.

With her wonderful subconscious intelligence Miss Bennett had retraversed a whole year of time. Last week a letter was received by the father of the young man from a survivor of the expedition, conveying the intelligence that the lost man had wandered away from the party over a year ago and had never been heard of since.

There is another proof:

Recently Miss Bennett fell and broke her wrist. During her subsequent treatment by the physicians she suffered intense pain. Mr. McLaughlin arrived on the scene and immediately placed her in a state of hypnosis. Her pain vanished, and did not return even when she was restored to her normal condition. Since then the wrist has been mending rapidly. This leads to the subject of suggestive therapeutics or mental healing.

"Almost any form of disease," says Mr. McLaughlin, "will yield to this form of treatment, except ailments which are the result of the structural tissue being partially or wholly destroyed. It is safe to say that nearly 75 per cent of the drugs administered do not reach the seat of the disease, by reason of an erroneous diagnosis, and other organs or parts of the anatomy are deranged as a result, and a complication of diseases arises. The doctor experiments with this and that course of drugs and finally effects what is considered a miraculous cure. But the patient has really thrown off the disease through suggestion, manifested through the medium of the drugs and medicines.

"In old times, when some mysterious old woman was able to remove warts and other portions of the body and relieve minor pains, such as headache and kindred ailments, she was looked upon as a witch, persecuted as such, and sometimes killed. She was considered to be possessed of supernatural power derived from some evil source, generally from Satan himself. All the power and the only power that she exercised (and that unconsciously to herself), was suggestion. She was not guilty of deception, as she was unconscious herself of how she did things. These old women seldom said anything to a patient; they merely passed their hands over the afflicted parts and stated that the trouble would be quickly removed. This was the suggestion as noted above and the explanation is Suggestion placed by another or auto-suggestion (suggestion placed by one's self) at some time. The passing of a manifestation of a suggestion.

"For instance, a woman is ill; she sends for the first convenient physician, and he administers a medicine which fails to relieve or cure; then she sends for the 'old reliable family physician;' tells him she has employed another doctor before calling him. He diagnoses the case, examines the medicine prescribed by the first comer, condemns it and then gives her the same medicine with emphatic assurance that it will cure her. And the result is a well woman. Why? Because she has confidence in the last doctor and not in the first."

Physicians of the city have been questioned concerning this phenomenon. Dr. W. R. Caldwell says:

"The case to me is highly interesting, and at the same time very perplexing. I do not know what to make of it. Mr. McLaughlin has undoubtedly performed some wonderful experiments, but whether he or anyone else can make use of the results is yet to be found out. The subjective mind has been for many years a knotty problem for the psychologists, and now when its actual existence has been practically established it assumes a more complex aspect. Prof. McLaughlin is not alone in his experiments; a number of physicians and psychologists of the city are as interested as he, and all are working to the same end—the answer to the question: 'What is this mind, how does it act, and why?'"—St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch.

IN DREAMLAND.

Much Valuable Information Comes Therefrom.

"Do you believe in dreams," asked a prominent local railroad official as he sat in his office with the reporter. "Well, I do, and I have been aided at three different times in my life, in a wonderful manner, by obeying the impulse furnished me by a dream. I believe that I shall not refuse to trust them." When urged to tell the story of his most interesting dream, the official replied:

"It was more than twenty years ago that I was helped by a dream and not only was I helped, but I believe that it saved the lives of hundreds of persons. I was ticket agent and operator at the time at a very small station until nearly midnight. I waited each night for a through stock train to pass and it was often very late. It is the duty of every agent to examine his switches the last thing at night and I always walked up several yards to the north switch on my way home after the stock train passed.

"On this particular night I was detained at the station until after 11 o'clock. It was a bitter night, with the temperature courting the zero mark and a raging blizzard on the outside. My long wait had caused me to grow drowsy and after the stock train passed I bundled up well and took the shortest cut for home without thinking of the north switch. I spent twenty minutes in my room before retiring and then fell into a troubled sleep. Within a short time I had a dream, and everyday surroundings appeared. Presently my attention was directed to the north switch and I was horrified to see that it was locked half open, snow and ice choking it from going farther. I started and woke up, only to find that it was a dream and that I was in a comfortable bed. I banished the idea and again went to sleep. Before I had been asleep many minutes the same dream or vision appeared again and I could plainly see the switch just half open, with that wicked derail set to wreck any passenger train. I woke again and this time I pinched myself to see if I really was awake. I was and I determined to reassure myself.

"Although the night was just as wooly as when I retired, I dressed, secured my lantern, and telling my wife that I must meet an early train, floundered out across the yard in the blizzard. By stumbling about for many minutes I finally reached the north switch and swung my lantern above it. As I did so I could distinguish the faint 'click-click' of the rails which told of an approaching train. I knew that several specials were expected to pass within twenty-four hours. As I brushed back the snow, I was shocked to see that, just as in my dream, the switch was standing locked half way open.

"Well, I wasted no time. I grasped the lever but could not throw the switch against the lock, and my key to the switch was at the office several hundred yards away. I knew that I must act instantly. First I rushed up the track toward the approaching train and set my lantern in the center of the track, with a dim hope that the engine crew might see the white light and be afforded an opportunity to jump for their lives. Then I started to run to the office. Struggling against the wind and snow, falling and slipping back, I pressed on and reached the station exhausted. But I secured my office key as I ran and unlocked the inner door and grasped my switch key. Then I began the race back. How I succeeded I never knew as the entire proceeding seemed to be another dream but I knew that I reached the switch just as a faint light approached around a curve. With the impediment of ice and snow my already weakened strength faced a hard tussle, but by an almost superhuman effort I threw the heavy lever as a crash and a roar passed by me, in the shape of a heavy limited passenger train. I did not faint but I never came so near doing it before. When I looked for my lantern it had been broken into thousands of pieces, and never noticed by the train crew, who could not distinguish the white light in that blinding snow storm.

"I did not report the matter for several months, expecting possibly to hear a word from some other source. When I did report it I received a strong call down from the superintendent. The switch was located just around a sharp curve with embankment and ditch opposite each other, a terrible spot for a wreck. I believe that I owe the salvation of the lives of those passengers and my position to that dream."—Dubuque (Iowa) Herald.

A VIOLIN HAUNTED.

It Is Played Upon by a Ghost.

A violin, which formerly was the property of Herman Schifferl, a violin manufacturer, who died in Minneapolis last summer, is said to be bewitched. A weird, uncanny mystery surrounds it, which has not yet been cleared away by any reasonable explanation. It is said that the violin gives forth musical sounds which have been distinctly heard by human ears, while no human hands were seen to touch the instrument.

The first time that the sounds came from the violin was during the week following Mr. Schifferl's death, and the instrument was then hanging in what formerly was his workshop, 424 Nicollet avenue. There were several other violins hanging at either side of it, but Mrs. Schifferl, who was the only one in the shop at the time, has declared that she heard strains of music, and that they came from this particular violin. Her friends assured her that she must have been dreaming, or that she imagined that she heard the sounds. Others said that a current of air might have caused the strings to give forth the notes which Mrs. Schifferl heard.

These explanations did not change Mrs. Schifferl's opinion. She was perfectly sure that she heard the sounds, and that none of the causes mentioned were responsible.

After a time the violin went into the possession of Miss Verna Golden, the violinist, and while it was at her home, 3019 Lyndale avenue, the violin again was heard to play.

It was left in a room upstairs, and was the only violin there. The members of the family who were at home were seated at the dinner table. They declare that they heard a violin play, and that the sounds came from the room where this violin lay, out of its case. Miss Golden was not at home when the mysterious sounds were heard.—Minneapolis Tribune.

THE VISION.

Wearied by sorrow, deep stained by sin,
I came to the church, and entered in.

Tenderly sweet as an infant's prayer,
The roll of the organ filled the air.

I thought of the time so long ago,
When with souls unsoiled, and pure as snow,

We worshiped together, when life was new,
Side by side in the high-backed pew.

I looked through the aisles so long and dim,
As the choir boys sang the holy hymn.

My heart gave a leap that sight to see!
For in her old seat, there was she.

Pale, pale her face, so sweet and meek
(My heart would burst if I did not speak).

"Long have the years been since last we met,
Have you come to tell me you love me yet?

"A thousand times in storm and sleet
I warmed your grave with kisses sweet.

"But never till now from the bliss above
Have you brought me token or sign of love."

With love that was heavenly, pure, and true;
She looked upon me with eyes so blue.

Not a word she spoke, in the twilight gray
She beckoned to come, then faded away.

"Peace, trembling heart, for I know that she
The one whom I love, now waits for me."

MINNESOTA.

The State Spiritualist Association.

The fourth annual mass meeting of the State Spiritualists' Association of Minnesota, held in St. Paul, February 21, 22 and 23, was carried to a successful close, with the evening meeting of Sunday, the 23d.

From its opening conference until the closing session the utmost harmony prevailed, and the steadily increasing interest and attendance gave satisfactory evidence of the quality of the work done by the various workers in attendance.

The meetings opened Friday morning with a conference under the direction of the writer. The attendance was good for an opening session, and the discussions were lively, and animated by the best of feeling between the participants.

After luncheon had been served by the ladies, we adjourned to the large hall, for the afternoon session, where the work of the mass meetings began in reality.

After an invocation we were treated to an able address by and through Mrs. Geo. Tryon, of Minneapolis. This was keenly enjoyed by the many friends of this time-tried worker. The address contained many points that were at once timely and instructive.

Following this, a song rendered by a quartette of Lyceum girls of Minneapolis, added zest to the meetings and made the necessary conditions for Miss Alice Wickstrom, who followed with greetings.

A young lady of pleasing personality, Miss Wickstrom gave evidence which proved that she will yet be much heard of in connection with our cause.

After Miss Wickstrom the writer responded to the call and made a few remarks upon some of his pet hobbies, which seemed to coincide with the views of some of the audience.

Then Mrs. E. A. Sauer, another of the faithful workers in the cause of Spiritualism, and for many years a member of the St. Paul Alliance, gave greetings from the other shore. These gave comfort to the recipients. Mrs. Sauer is another who has been added to the list of missionaries for Minnesota.

At the evening meeting the musical part of the program was under the direction of Prof. Zumbach, well known to the Spiritualists of the Northwest. The name of Prof. Zumbach is guarantee that the musical was by no means the least enjoyable part of the meeting.

An invocation by Mrs. J. P. Whitwell was followed by some stirring remarks by J. P. Whitwell, the efficient president of the Alliance of St. Paul, and J. S. Maxwell, the everyday president of the State Association.

The address of the evening, by Clara L. Stewart, was enjoyed by the many in attendance, and brought forth frequent applause.

Mrs. Stewart was followed by Will J. Erwood and Alice Wickstrom, with messages for the hungry souls present, which gave comfort to some aching hearts, and the audience went home feeling they wanted more of the good things in the spiritual philosophy.

Saturday morning another stirring conference, that welded those assembled together in spirit. Bro. J. H. McDonald was the chairman, and succeeded in bringing a large number into the discussion, and everyone seemed inspired to a high degree.

Drs. G. B. and Emma Nickerson Warne, of Chicago, also took part in the discussion, to the satisfaction of the large number assembled.

After the physical wants of man had been attended to another visit to the large hall, adjoining the dining room, and the afternoon session was opened.

An address by Mrs. S. M. Lowell, one of the pioneers of the Northwest, gave pleasure to her hearers. An incident of particular interest to the old-timers, as well as the younger ones, was a message from Mother Lepper through the organism of Mrs. Lowell.

Next came Mrs. Elizabeth Holmes, of Minneapolis, with her clear readings, and a manner that carries conviction with it. With a personality of the most pleasing kind, Mrs. Holmes inspires one with the feeling that there is one who is a Spiritualist from the time she gets up in the morning till she goes to bed at night, and from night till morning, and seven days in the week, too. Her readings were very clear, and recognized by those who received them.

Dr. Geo. B. Warne, of Chicago, followed Mrs. Holmes with a powerful address. Dr. Warne is too well known to need introduction from this quarter. Suince it to say that by his work here many friends have been added to his list. I wish I might give a verbatim account of that address.

After Bro. Warne the writer was again called upon to give voice to the messages and greetings from the denizens of the spheres beyond the grave.

Evening session at 7:30 once more called us to the assembly hall to receive the good things in store for us.

The preliminaries over, President Maxwell introduced Dr. Emma Nickerson Warne as the speaker of the evening, who gave an address on "The Moses and Aaron Within Us."

Dr. Warne succeeded in working her way into the spirit of the splendid audience, and held their closest attention all through her address, and gave us much food for thought.

Mrs. Ella White then demonstrated her ability as a psychic by giving many convincing tests to many present. Mrs. White is one of the most reliable and capable mediums in St. Paul and the Northwest. She does good work all the time.

Mrs. White was followed by Dr. Emma Warne, with her convincing psychometric readings. Her readings were greatly enjoyed by those present.

Sunday three sessions were given, beginning in the morning with another forceful address by Dr. Geo. B. Warne. We were sorry to see Bro. Warne take his seat. His address contained many splendid lessons and illustrations that are needed by many.

Remarks by the writer and Mrs. White closed the morning session.

The afternoon program was particularly interesting. An address by Clara L. Stewart was a masterly effort, and though Mrs. Stewart said she did not have a thought in her head, she certainly played on the harp of inspiration with splendid effect.

Then came ordination exercises, conducted by Mrs. Geo. Tryon, Alice Wickstrom, Mrs. J. P. Whitwell and Mrs. E. A. Sauer received their commissions as accredited workers and missionaries of the State Association.

Each of these workers responded feelingly at the close of the ordination services. Next a bright little girl, the 11 months old daughter, was brought to the stand and christened by Mrs. Tryon. It was an impressive ceremony, beautifully carried out.

Dr. Emma Warne and Will J. Erwood then followed with psychic readings.

In the evening Dr. Warne was again the principal speaker, and favored us with another splendid address, her subject being the "Tint of the Flower of Spiritualism." Following her address she gave some more of her splendid psychometric delineations.

Preceding the lecture Mrs. Ella White held the audience for nearly half an hour, giving test after test, proving the life after death. Remarks were made by Geo. B. Warne and Mrs. Stewart, and Bro. Edwards made a plea for the Morris Pratt Institute Association, setting forth the necessity of education and receiving pledges from a number in the audience, to aid in carrying on the work of education.

The writer was once more called upon to give the messages from loved ones across the border land.

The session closed with one of the largest audiences ever assembled in St. Paul, people being turned away because of inability to get seats.

President Maxwell presided at all meetings and worked incessantly for their success. The ladies surpassed themselves in every way, and good feeling marked one of the most successful meetings of the Northwest.

One thing unmentioned was the Lyceum of the St. Paul Alliance, which participated in the afternoon exercises, marching on the stage with flags flying. A beautiful song was rendered by the members of the Lyceum, under the direction of Mrs. Frank Kilshaw, the musical director of the Alliance.

WILL J. ERWOOD.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.

Spiritualism and Other Matters.

This beautiful city on the bay is one of the most charming resorts of Southern California. With its magnificent scenery and equable climate it is a favorite with most eastern tourists and with many from the northern country along the coast. From the different hill-tops or elevations with which the city abounds, the views of bay and ocean, Point Loma and Coronado, and of the city itself are truly inspiring. The side trips which can be taken with little expense to National City, the Chula Vista valley, Tia Juana in old Mexico, Sweetwater Dam, La Jolla and Point Loma, are all very interesting as well as health-giving.

This is truly a sunny land, one in which the sunshine is literally for sale when it comes to securing rooms in the numerous hotels with which the city abounds. Point Loma, the headquarters of Theosophy, is an elevation 380 feet above sea level, and from this point and theosophical buildings is a view of sea and bay, Coronado and San Diego, which extensive travelers declare can not be duplicated for beauty and grandeur in the world.

The great drawback in this country is the lack of rain, less than two inches having fallen during the present season. With a normal amount of rainfall it would become a veritable paradise for the very gods. There is a marked liberal sentiment among the people, and Spiritualism has a strong foothold in this section. There is a most excellent society in San Diego, and the right hand of fellowship is extended to visiting Spiritualists right royally. They are under the leadership of Mrs. Clara A. Beck, who seems to be the right woman in the right place, with J. L. Dryden, as their permanent speaker. I say permanent because for the past nine years he has ever been ready to serve the society when no other speaker was at hand, and his duties have ever been conscientiously and faithfully performed. Personally I am indebted to him for a hearing, as he very kindly and generously gave me two Sundays of his time, Feb. 9 and 16.

The Sunday morning service on the 16th was devoted to the ordination of Brother Dryden. The principal address was given by W. C. Hodge, who took for his topic, "The Duty and Necessity of Organization," after which ordination was conferred by Mrs. Morrill, of National City, with welcome to the ranks by Mrs. Mullen, of same place. A very touching response was made by Col. Dryden. I am a believer in the ordination of all such unselfish and intelligent workers as Bro. Dryden, who is one of Nature's noblemen, one who will reflect credit upon himself and the cause which he represents.

An entertainment and social was held on the evening of the 13th ult., with a musical and intellectual program which would be creditable in any society even in our largest centers of population. An excellent lyceum is maintained, with an average attendance of more than fifty members, and is conducted by Charles A. Buss.

There are a number of excellent mediums here, Mrs. King, who has long stood as an open door between the visible and invisible expression of life; Mrs. Mathews, Laura M. Hyland, Mrs. Morrill and Mrs. Mullen of National City, and Mrs. L. M. Theabaud, medium and speaker, and at the present time Mrs. Elliott, of Whatcom, Wash., who is here to escape the rains and fogs of the northern country. They work harmoniously and it is my conviction that each and every one is worthy and sincere and they all have the endorsement of the San Diego friends.

I am more than glad to be able to state that the sensationalist and fakirs have had their day in this locality, and all such would find a mighty scant welcome in San Diego.

I must not forget our healing mediums of whom Dr. H. M. Bailey is a worthy representative. I have tested his powers since coming here, with great benefit to myself, and know whereof I speak.

The San Diego friends are looking forward to the building of a church or hall of their own in the near future. This will undoubtedly be accomplished, as the courts have decided that bequests for that purpose is valid, though the money is not immediately available.

I am more than pleased with this beautiful country, and it seems strange to hear the citizens talking of winter while roses are blooming in the open air. My health, strength and happiness has increased with every day, and I shall remain here during this month and possibly longer. Headquarters will remain at the New York House, and I will suggest to any friends who may be coming this way, that they will find this house centrally located, with homelike surroundings, and reasonable prices, and one of the best kept houses in San Diego.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entrancing, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1902.

Thoughtlessness of the Learned.

Engaged in pleasant conversation some thirty years ago with an aged medical practitioner, who delighted on every favorable occasion to ventilate his knowledge of the Greek, and his familiarity with the classic authors in their native tongue, we inquired:

"Is it not incredible that the New Testament was originally written in Greek? The apostles are represented as the authors of the Gospels, who, it is claimed, were but fishermen of Galilee. Paul, with his Epistles, is represented as a sail-maker. Not one of the writers is represented as a Greek scholar. They were Syrio-Phoenicians, and doubtless discoursed and wrote in the language of that country—the language the people of that country understood. Even Paul to the Romans, and to the Hebrews, appears in Greek, and the translators on the title-page say "Translated out of the original Greek." Is there not a mistake about this? You, as a churchman and a scholar, will place me under great obligations to relieve me of doubts on this subject."

A week or so later we chanced to meet the Doctor again. He said: "That question you asked me when we last met, for the first time in my life has absorbed my thought. I went through college, and made myself perfectly at home with classic Greek and the Greek of the New Testament, many chapters of which I memorized. It is very different from classic Greek, and shows it was not written by good Greek scholars. Your question has awakened a train of thought which will go with me through life. While no way inclined to skepticism as relates to matters pertaining to our holy religion, I own my faith as to the origin of the New Testament is badly shaken."

Dr. Eddy's case is like thousands of others. They go through life and never question the origin of their faith, or the truth of the pretended record on which that faith is based. And they who discover the Christian frauds, because of business, social, or political relations, shrink from an avowal of their honest convictions, and go down to the grave concealing their real sentiments from the world. The more prominent their position the greater the reluctance to make an open avowal of their changed faith.

If the old errors are ever discarded it will be brought about through the active influence of those who have learned the truth, and have the bravery and the manliness to proclaim it to those who through thoughtlessness or indifference still struggle in darkness.

A Wonderful Test Experience.

A friend in whom we place implicit trust, makes the following statement:

"I was alone at work in the garden some thirty odd years ago. A solid gold chain was attached to my watch by a sort of clasp, which was held in place by a screw nut which turned down over the divided parts when closed upon the stem of the watch. The other end was attached by a hook in a button-hole of the vest. I was intent in thought on a long dead friend. Bending over the young beans to pull the weeds from the hill I noticed the chain swinging loose, detached from the watch. Immediately it occurred to me the screw had loosed, by long wear, and took out my watch to renew the necessary connection. I found the screw fastening the clasp in place, and the parts in perfect condition. Then I looked to the ring attached to the stem of the watch, and found it perfect. Of course the incident was a profound mystery, and would be incredible if told me by another. The proper connections were then made; the screw was turned down with extra force; the watch was replaced in my pocket, and labor was resumed with the hoe, the mind intent on the wonderful experience through which I had just passed. Not five minutes intervened when that chain was again swinging loose as before, again detached from the watch; the connections still perfect. With watch and chain thus severed I went into the house and reported my adventure to the family. I will affirm most positively to the truth of this statement in every particular."

Our friend says: "Until some law of nature is discovered by which a solid metallic body is able of itself to pass through another solid metallic body he shall believe the chain and watch were detached by invisible spirit hands.

Times Change.

That learned author, Evan Powell Meredith, in "The Prophet of Nazareth," p. 546, note, says:

"Not until after the Reformation was the Bible allowed to be read by the commonality; previously it was a sealed book to all but the priestly class. Even in the time of Henry VIII, a statute was passed, forbidding workmen and women to read it, on pain of death."

If the statute had been enlarged to include the priests, and had been made perpetual, and extended to all countries, it is not probable good morals would have been the loser.

"Why I Am a Vegetarian." By J. Howard Moore. An address before the Chicago Vegetarian Society. Price 25 cents.

The American Branch of the Society for Psychical Research.

This society has done good work in its peculiar way. It has a peculiar way, all its own, of doing things. It takes nothing for granted, and must have demonstration, and does not accept propositions that it claims to have demonstrated, except as under suspicion, and the firm belief that future research will demonstrate the worthlessness of preceding demonstrations.

Now it has started out to demonstrate immortality. It would be inferred by an outsider that the best way to do this would be to investigate by way of spiritual phenomena, as the society has acknowledged the genuineness of at least some of them. Not so—it proposes to solve this great and wonderful problem, by taking an average of the "preferences" of an indefinite but large number of individuals. For this object it sends out a circular containing a series of questions to be answered. These questions are prefaced with an introduction which says that "there is a wide-spread literary tradition that men naturally desire a future life." Some claim that this belief is evidence of future existence, others deny that there is a universal belief. What does the majority of the educated and competent vote? That is the object to ascertain. The questions are to be answered by "personal preference, sentiment, or desire of those who answer them quite irrespective of their religious faith or reasoned convictions," the influence of which is to be separately recorded. It is suggested by way of a "hint," that "no" is as valuable as "yes," and refusal to answer has its psychological value.

I. Would you prefer to live after death or not?

II. If I., do you desire a future life whatever the conditions might be? If not, what would you have to be its character to make the prospect seem tolerable? Would you, e. g., be content with a life more or less like your present life? Can you say what elements in life (if any) are felt by you to call for its perpetuity?

III. Can you state why you feel in this way, as regards questions I. and II.?

IV. Do you now feel the question of a future life to be of urgent importance to your mental comfort?

V. Have your feelings on questions I., II. and IV. undergone change? If so, when and in what ways?

VI. Would you like to know for certain about the future life, or would you prefer to leave it a matter of faith?

Every student of human nature knows to a certainty that it would be impossible to answer these questions free from the bias of religious training or belief. If one could free himself from influences immediately exerted, how is he to escape his inheritance of beliefs erroneous from his ancestors by heredity? And granting that all hereditary taint and present influences are eradicated, what good, what demonstration, if a thousand or a million answer yes, and a thousand or a million answer no?

If a scientist should undertake to prove that the inhabitants of a South Sea island were cannibals, he would probably recommend a zealous missionary to go there with the gospel, and if he disappeared, or better if several missionaries disappeared, and one returned sore with wounds, and reported that the others were eaten, he would set the natives down as banqueters on human flesh. But this would not be the way of the Psychical Research Society. It would send out a circular to the chiefs with these questions.

I. Do you prefer human flesh, or not?

II. If you do, what condition do you prefer to have it in?

III. If not, what condiment would make it tolerable? Would you be content without it?

IV. Can you state why you feel in this way?

V. Do you feel that such diet is essential for your comfort?

VI. Have you had any change of feeling in this matter; if so, when, and why?

VII. Would you prefer to know this as a fact, or take it like a Christian Scientist on faith?

The replies of the "competent" would probably read as follows:

I. Like "long-pig;" good victuals.

II. Like missionary best; fatty, boiled in pot with yam yam.

III. Content with or without Worcestershire or Tobasco sauce, or gospel jelly. Can eat clear stuff or peppered and salted, as comes handy.

IV. Felt this way all my life, and granther felt ditto.

V. Essential for my comfort—the joy of me life and me religion.

VI. Nary a change. Allus samee. Kill missionary, when hungry, on sight.

VII. Rather have long-pig in pot, than think it is there. No pig in pot, no eatee.

By carefully collating several thousand such reports after they have been gathered, the conclusion would be reached that the islanders were surely cannibals.

As a report on psychological research, this would have a value quite equal to that now being made to determine whether the majority have desire for immortality or prefer annihilation at death. What is the value of it, whether decided in the affirmative or negative? The identification of a single spirit by the message it brings, is incontestible evidence, and this immortality does not depend on the desires or beliefs of men, but is their heritage.

Healers and Astrologers.

Capt. Walrond writes from Denver, Colo.:

"The Denver (Colo.) Board of Aldermen have passed a bill and city ordinance, licensing and regulating astrologers, clairvoyants, card-readers, fortune-tellers, mind-readers, palmists, phrenologists, magnetic healers and psychologists, within the city of Denver.

"The annual license is to be $100, and any astrologer, medium, magnetic healer, clairvoyant, palmist, etc., practicing without a license, or violating any of the provisions of the city ordinance, is to be fined, upon conviction, in sums varying from $10 to $100. The ordinance was passed and became a law on the 18th day of February, 1902."

Good.

Archbishop Corrigan issued a special dispensation allowing people to eat meat at the dinner given to Prince Henry in New York, while visiting there. That was very kind indeed. Without that dispensation every mother's son who ate meat would have been required to do penance, else serve for a time in purgatory.

A REMARKABLE LIBEL SUIT.

The Illinois State Spiritualists' Association and the Editor Sued for $25,000 Damages.

When the Case Was Called for Trial, the Plaintiff, Realizing the Damaging Evidence Against Her, Cowardly Slunk Away—She Dare Not Face the Ordeal.

A subscriber writes: "What has become of Mabel Jackman's libel suit for $25,000 damages against The Progressive Thinker and the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association? Has it been settled by compromise between the parties, or did you pay the $25,000 asked for? Let us have all the facts in the case. Spiritualists are entitled to the information, as this libel suit was waged by one who had been expelled from the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association.

In compliance with the request of many we give below a full account of the noted libel suit wherein $25,000 damages to character was alleged.

It will be remembered by our readers that the woman Mabel Aber Jackman, whose methods were exposed by the Lily Dale Camp-Meeting in the summer of 1895, and later exposed in the same character in Chicago and expelled from the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, brought suit in the courts of Cook county against the officers of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association and the editor and publisher of The Progressive Thinker, alleging in her suit that those officers and the editor of that paper had "wickedly and maliciously" defamed the character of the said Mabel Aber Jackman, in that they had published an account of her exposure at Lily Dale and of her conviction and expulsion from the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association for alleged fraudulent practices as a medium.

We never did believe that the suit for libel brought against us and the officers of the Illinois Association was brought in good faith and with the intention of prosecuting the same to a final judgment; because, in the first place, we knew that everything that we and the officers of the Illinois Association had published, and a hundred times more, was absolutely true, and that we could prove it.

Now that the case has been disposed of in our favor and that the matter has been made public by the records of the Circuit Court of Cook County, we lay before our readers the gist of the court records that they may determine whether or not this woman, who by those records is proven to be guilty of all that we charged her, is a fit representative of the cause of Spiritualism in any capacity whatever.

The declaration filed against us on April 11, 1900, in the Circuit Court of Cook County, in which we are charged as libelers of Mrs. Jackman, is as follows (omitting some of the formal parts):

"Mabel Aber Jackman, plaintiff, by David Gilmour, her attorney, complains of George B. Warne, James Freeman, Ella M. Johnson, Ervin A. Rice, Hiram Eddy, Orrin Merritt, M. W. Packard and J. R. Francis, editor and publisher of The Progressive Thinker, published at No. 40 Loomis street, in the city of Chicago and State of Illinois, defendants, of a plea of trespass on the case.

"For that whereas the plaintiff before and at the time of permitting by the defendants of the several grievances hereinafter mentioned, was a person of good name, credit and reputation and deservedly enjoyed the esteem and good opinion of her neighbors and other worthy citizens of this State.

"Yet the defendants, well knowing the premises, but wickedly and maliciously intending to injure the plaintiff and to bring her into public scandal and disgrace, on Saturday, March 24, A. D. 1900, at Chicago, in the County of Cook and State of Illinois, wickedly and maliciously did compose and publish and cause to be composed and published of and concerning the plaintiff in a certain newspaper called The Progressive Thinker, published at No. 40 Loomis street, in the city of Chicago, in the County of Cook and State of Illinois, whereof the defendants were then and there the writers for and the editor and proprietor, a certain false, scandalous, malicious and defamatory libel, containing (among other things) the false, scandalous, malicious, defamatory and libelous matters following, of and concerning the plaintiff, that is to say:

"'Whereas, the records of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association show that in the year 1898, Edward E. Jackman and Mabel Aber Jackman, of Chicago, were expelled from the Association and their ordination papers declared null and void for good and sufficient cause, after thorough investigation, examination and trial, at which they were given ample opportunity to make defense, and

"'Whereas, certain parties, to wit, D. Stearns White, David Gilmour, Charles Howell, Mabel Aber Jackman, Edward E. Jackman and others have unlawfully conspired together in an effort to reinstate the said Jackmans in the good estimation of the public, and to render nugatory the action of this Association, and,

"'Whereas, said parties have unlawfully assumed the name of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, and unlawfully claim the right to issue charters to subordinate societies, and have issued such papers knowing that they have no right to do so;

"'Now therefore, we hereby give due notice to the public that said parties are knowingly acting wholly without excuse or warrant in law or equity, and the public is hereby warned that any action taken or certificates issued by said persons are of no legal value whatever and will not be recognized by this Association.

"'The machinery of our courts has been put in operation to enjoin these persons from their unlawful practices, and in the meantime all parties are cautioned against paying said parties any dues or money lawfully due to the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, which was incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois, July 16, 1896, and which is also chartered by the National Spiritualists' Association.

"'In connection herewith we (meaning the defendant, J. R. Francis,) desire to say that any organization, be it legally incorporated or otherwise, which will try to bolster up Mabel Aber Jackman, whose methods were exposed in Lily Dale and later in Chicago, and whose reputation is such among reputable Spiritualists that we do not think a single camp-meeting will want her on the grounds, is unworthy of recognition, and is, we verily believe, a standing disgrace to Spiritualism and a blight on Chicago. Those who have been ordained by this society with D. Stearns White as president, will not be allowed half-fare on any railroad, nor will they receive recognition from reputable Spiritualists throughout the country.—Editor.'

"'And the defendant J. R. Francis then and there falsely and maliciously sent the newspaper called The Progressive Thinker containing the false, scandalous, malicious, defamatory and libelous matters aforesaid by and through the United States mail to the subscribers to The Progressive Thinker aforesaid in the different States of the Union, including the State of Illinois, and the same was then received and read by the subscribers before mentioned as thereby published by the defendant, J. R. Francis, publisher and editor of The Progressive Thinker aforesaid, and written for said newspaper by the other defendants.

"By means of the committing of which said several grievances by the defendants, the plaintiff has been and is greatly injured in her said good name, credit and reputation, and brought into public scandal and disgrace and has been and is shunned and avoided by divers persons and has been and is otherwise injured: To the damage of the plaintiff of TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS, and therefore she brings her suit, etc.

"MABEL ABER JACKMAN,
"By DAVID GILMOUR,
"Her Attorney."

To this declaration, bristling with all the aspersive language known to the law and of which the English language is capable, the defendants, James Freeman, Ervin A. Rice, Orrin Merritt and J. R. Francis, filed two pleas, admitting the publication of the document charged, but alleging that the matters and things therein published were true, and that being true the plaintiff had no cause of action; that is, no legal ground for complaint, the pleas being what are termed in law, pleas of justification and of privileged communication. To these pleas the plaintiff (Mrs. Jackman) replied by a document known in law as a replication, which set forth that notwithstanding all that the defendants had said in their pleas the plaintiff had a cause of action, being as much as to say that the pleas of the defendant were not true but that the original declaration of the plaintiff was true.

Upon these papers the case was at issue and the parties were at liberty to proceed with the taking of proof bearing upon the truth or falsity of the charges in the declaration and the denials and assertions in the pleas. Pursuant to this right and practice the defendants proceeded to take the depositions of witnesses in Meadville, Pennsylvania, near the camping grounds at Lily Dale, New York, to sustain the assertion in the publication that the methods of Mrs. Jackman were exposed at Lily Dale in 1895. Those depositions are under the sanctity of the prescribed legal oath, and are clothed with all the solemnity of legal procedure. The first witness called was the Hon. A. B. Richmond, of Meadville, Pa., and his deposition is as follows:

"My name is A. B. Richmond; I am 75 years of age; have practiced law 50 years; was educated surgeon, physician and chemist; reside in the city of Meadville, County of Crawford and State of Pennsylvania. I attended the Assembly of Spiritualists at Lily Dale, N. Y., in the summer of 1895; was there through the whole season. I attended three of the seances of Mrs. Mabel Aber Jackman there. At the first seance I attended there was a dark curtain hung across one corner of the room. After the audience had assembled, Mrs. Jackman, the medium, entered the cabinet; the lights were turned down, leaving the room about as dark as a faint moonlight. Soon a tall figure, dressed in an officer's uniform, came out of the cabinet. Mrs. Jackman's assistant informed us that it was the spirit of Stonewall Jackson. As the figure turned around I plainly saw the face of Mrs. Jackman—I am confident of that; the supposed spirit-form was that of the medium, dressed in uniform. A number of female forms of various sizes, appeared. Soon thereafter a tall female form, clothed in a long white garment, came out of the cabinet, made a few gestures of salutation and retired. We were informed that it was the spirit of Hypatia, a young and very beautiful daughter of Theon, an astronomer of Alexandria (Hypatia was murdered in the streets of Alexandria, A. D. 415). The face of the spirit form was that of the medium, well powdered, not beautiful, but ghastly and corpse-like, very like the face of Stonewall Jackson as he appeared.

"A few days after I was informed that Mrs. Jackman would hold another seance, in which pictures would be painted outside of the cabinet in full view of the audience. I attended that seance—the same room and cabinet, but lighter than the former scene. An easel was standing outside of the cabinet; on it was placed a canvas on a stretcher such as used by artists. It remained outside of the cabinet a short time, when we were informed that it would be necessary to take it into the cabinet in order to complete the picture, as the conditions were not favorable for outside work. In a few moments, the cabinet curtains were open, showing an easel with a canvas on it ready for the artist, but it was not the canvas, nor the stretcher that was on the easel when they were outside of the cabinet. The curtains were again closed, and in a few moments were again opened and there was a picture of a figure dressed in ancient Oriental costume, said to be an ancient philosopher, but it was not painted on either of the canvases that was shown before. It was a palpable fraud.

"The figures of the young girls that came out of the cabinet were substantial female forms both to sight and to touch. In fact, the whole show was manifestly fraudulent.

"The report of the seances created considerable excitement, and for this reason the committee was requested to investigate; A. Gaston, president of the Lily Dale Spiritualists' Association, H. W. Richardson and D. B. Merritt, trustee, and I think others, composed that committee. The result of their investigation was that they were convinced that Mrs. Jackman's seances were fraudulent and they so reported, but before their report was made, she, with her associates, had left the camp; I do not remember the date, but it was in August, 1895, a few days after the seance that I attended.

"I have been a Spiritualist for twelve years; have lectured many times and written several books and a number of newspaper and magazine articles on the subject.

"After the exposure of Mrs. Jackman in the fraud of the seances which I have narrated, her general reputation in the camp was that she was a fraudulent impostor. I know, and so do many others, that Mrs. Jackman's seances were fraudulent.

(Signed) "A. B. RICHMOND."

The deposition of Capt. M. R. Rouse in support of the defendant's pleas is in substance as follows:

"My name is M. R. Rouse; I reside at Titusville, Crawford county, Pa.; I am 65 years of age; was Chief of Police in Titusville a number of years and am now (October 30, 1900) Postmaster in the city of Titusville, Pa. I am one of the trustees of the Lily Dale Association of Spiritualists. I attended the session at Lily Dale in the summer of 1895; I was there over Sunday every week and frequently between times. I came to the camp the morning after Mrs. Mabel Aber Jackman and associates had left; they left the camp the night before, during the night. There was considerable excitement in the camp arising from the general report of the fraudulent seances of Mrs. Jackman. We went into the house of Mrs. Jackman and found fragments of uniform, clothes of different sizes, shapes and colors. The cabinet was erected between two doors, to the best of my recollection, so that confederates could have entered from the door. There was great commotion in the camp and a general report that Mrs. Jackman's seances were a fraud and that she had confederates concealed in the house. Public opinion demanded an examination and we made it. Mrs. Jackman had skipped out between two days. The house, upstairs and down, looked as if there had been a number of occupants who had left in a hurry. There was a peculiar kind of robe found between two mattresses on a bed; I cannot describe it, for it was unlike anything I had ever seen before. There were several trunks partly full of traps and trinkets. The things found were apparently for the make-up of different supposed spirit forms. After this examination it was the general opinion of the people in the camp that Mrs. Mabel Aber Jackman's seances were frauds, and it was so said by the visitors in general.

(Signed) "M. R. ROUSE."

The deposition of Hon. A. Gaston is as follows:

"My name is A. Gaston; I reside at Meadville, Crawford county, Pa.; I am 62 years of age, and am a member of the 56th Congress of the United States. I have been a Spiritualist for 40 years, and have been president of the Board of Trustees of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association for fifteen years. I have had a great deal of experience in spiritual phenomena.

"Owing to the report of the fraudulent practices among mediums in the camp of the Association of Spiritualists of Lily Dale, N. Y., during the summer of 1895, our attention was directed to Mrs. Mabel Aber Jackman, the plaintiff, in a discussion of the matter by the Board of Trustees and we decided to investigate. In pursuance thereof we called on Mrs. Jackman and requested permission to search her house, but she did not grant the request, and we then placed a man to watch the house because we suspected there were confederates concealed in the house. A few hours later three women left the house, one probably thirty years of age, the other two were young girls, probably aging from 12 to 16 years. They were followed, and went a roundabout way to the village of Cassadaga, about one mile from Lily Dale. I and two other trustees joined in the pursuit and overtook the three women at Cassadaga. From a close scrutiny of their features during a conversation with these people I can positively identify them as being photographed as spirits represented in Exhibits A, B and C, certified by Fred C. Kepler, Commissioner, and hereto attached. In a short time a carriage came along and the young ladies entered it and were driven away. We returned to the camp and had an interview with Mrs. Jackman, when she informed us that we could now examine her house, which we later proceeded to do. We found evidence of hasty flight of the young people, and different paraphernalia which had been used in fraudulent seances. That night Mrs. Jackman left the ground and I have not seen her since. The committee then proceeded to make a report, which said report is correct and true and accompanies this deposition, which is certified by the commissioner and marked Exhibit D.

(Signed) "A. GASTON."

Exhibit D, filed with Mr. Gaston's deposition, being the report of the committee made at the time of the occurrences, in August, 1895, is as follows:

"To the Trustees of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association:

"Your committee appointed to investigate certain rumors concerning the materializing seances held by Mrs. Mabel Aber Jackman at Lily Dale during the Summer Assembly of 1895, report as follows:

"That on or about the —— day of August, 1895, permission was asked of Mr. Jackman to examine the Aber cottage. After consultation with Mrs. Aber Jackman he asked us to postpone our visit until the next day. At this we caused watch to be immediately placed upon the cottage. The watchman very soon reported that two young women had left the said Aber cottage and a little later a woman and girl also came away from there. These four persons made their way to Cassadaga Village, one mile away, in patrs, as they had left the cottage. At Cassadaga Village your committee (two members) overtook and interviewed them. First, the two young women were questioned and admitted that they had been staying at the Aber Cottage for at least the ten days last past.

"Upon the arrival of the woman and girl, they were questioned, the woman claiming no acquaintance with or knowledge of the young women, which statement proved to be an untruth, as later developments demonstrated. It was evident that they had met at Cassadaga Village in accordance with a prearranged appointment. The woman admitted that she had just come from the Aber Cottage, claiming that she had come from New York City, arriving that morning, for the express purpose of a sitting with Mrs. Aber for slate writing, and that she was then on her way to the train and should return to New York City that night. When asked why she took the roundabout way to Cassadaga Village, one mile, and from there to Cassadaga Station, another mile or more, instead of taking the train at Lily Dale Station, only a few steps, she could give no satisfactory reason therefor, and your committee drew their own conclusions.

"Soon after our return from Cassadaga Village, we were informed by Mr. Jackman that we were at liberty to go through the cottage without waiting until the next day, but knowing as we did that four persons had decamped therefrom that afternoon, we were in no hurry to investigate. We, however, the next day examined the cottage more especially for the purpose of discovering if it were possible for persons to enter and leave the cabinet in the seance room so as not to be detected by the sitters.

"We found the cabinet located in the corner of the room from which a door opened into an adjoining room, which door was obscured from the view of the sitters. The cabinet was made of matched lumber put together in such a manner that each of the boards constituting the sides of the cabinet stood perpendicular, extending each way from the corner, six or eight feet, and joined together with boards across the top, joining the two sides in the form of an obtuse angle; the entire cabinet being independent from the sides or top of the room and therefore movable. The cabinet curtain was hung across the corner of the room and outside of the outer extremities of the sides of the cabinet, as shown in the accompanying drawing.

[Not necessary to give it here.]

"The dotted line indicates the position of the curtain, and the crooked mark indicates a possible way of ingress and egress to the cabinet from the door in its rear.

"Your committee was shown what purported to be a flashlight spirit photograph taken in a private seance given by Mrs. Aber. In this photograph, arranged about the sitters were four forms purporting to be spirit pictures. The size, shape and general contour of these four forms corresponded exactly with that of the four persons who left the Aber Cottage so suddenly after your committee asked Mr. Jackman's consent to examine it; and owing to the fact that the faces were veiled, three of them could not be positively identified by their features, but the face of the smaller of the two young women showed so plainly that there can be no question as to her identity, and your committee know that picture was the picture of one of the two young ladies who first left the cottage as before stated.

(Signed) "H. W. RICHARDSON,
"A. GASTON,
"D. B. MERRITT."

Fac simile copies of the photographs, Exhibits A, B and C, attached to the deposition of the Hon. A. Gaston, and filed in court therewith, are hereto appended, which, together with the report of the committee and the depositions of these eminent representatives of Spiritualism in the East, will certainly afford the unbiased reader an excellent view of one of the transactions out of which our nefarious libel of Mrs. Jackman grew. We leave it to impartial judgment as to whether in this instance we did Mrs. Jackman any wrong.

As to Mrs. Jackman's methods in Chicago justifying the action of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, our proof, had the case come to trial, would have been equally as strong if not stronger in sustaining our plea of justification.

The case never was actually tried before the court and jury, nor was it ever intended by the plaintiff that it should be tried. We stood ready to produce our witnesses when the case was called; neither Mrs. Jackman nor her attorney was there to sustain their charges so ferociously made in their declaration. Hence, there was nothing for the court to do but to dismiss the case at the plaintiff's costs; those costs stand now by the records of the court a judgment against Mrs. Jackman. Will she pay them? We expect not. She is willing and has been willing all along to make us all the expense she could; she is willing to harm others and put them to infinite expense and trouble in maintaining their legal and moral rights, and yet, she poses as a teacher of the doctrine of Spiritualism. But from one accustomed to her practices we of course can expect nothing else. For ourselves we care nothing; but we are concerned when it comes to the question whether or not Spiritualism shall be represented and held forth to the world by and through such teachers as these. The wonder is that such as these should have any following at all in the ranks of Spiritualists. Let all such ponder the facts set forth in this article and then ask themselves whether they can afford longer to follow in the trail of this high priestess of chicanery and fraud, as set forth in the preceding affidavits.

The evidence presented above is a showing that is eminently well calculated to bring the blush of shame to the cheeks of all respectable Spiritualists. The witnesses whose lucid evidence is spread before our readers this week are widely known, and universally respected. Mr. Gaston has been a member of Congress; Mr. Richmond is eminent as a lawyer, while Mr. Rouse is postmaster at his home town.

Mrs. Jackman little thought what she was bringing upon herself when she commenced a malicious libel suit against the Illinois State Spiritualist Association and ourself, placing the damages at $25,000—the suit instituted wholly for the purpose of annoyance, with no intention whatever of ever pressing the same to a final conclusion. The defendants in the case, however, went promptly to work in securing the evidence presented above, and much more—mountain high—which would have been available had the case come to trial.

Now, reputable Spiritualists, you are left with this evidence, and you are at liberty to judge of the same. Are you ready to accept her as a teacher in any respect whatever? She is one of the leading officers of the Illinois Inter-State Spiritualist Association—in fact, she controls it, and under her influence it has, we have been informed, been ordaining "Ministers of the Gospel of Spiritualism."

Just think of this gang controlled entirely by her, sending out ministers of the Gospel to minister unto Spiritualists. Read the evidence above given, and then ask yourself, "What is Spiritualism coming to when such a gang presumes to act for reputable Spiritualists?"

The question may be asked, how can such a class exist in Chicago? Simply from the fact that this is a city of nearly two millions of inhabitants, and innocent gullibles can be found who have never heard of the evidence presented above. Of course they soon catch on to the gang's method, and leave while other victims come to the front.

Those who have been ordained by Mrs. Jackman's Inter-State Association as ministers of the gospel, will receive no credit—no honor—no commendation outside of the gang with whom they have affiliated; in fact they will be ignored wholly by every reputable Spiritualist camp, and their endorsement will prove to them a boomerang; they are tainted with bad influences.

Too great credit can not be conferred upon the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, Dr. Geo. B. Warne as president, for the noble fight it has put up against the worst gang that ever afflicted any community. Its name was assumed by the gang—absolutely stolen—and every effort made to get supreme control of it. Under the name of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, the gang sent out laudatory circulars endorsing Mrs. Jackman, and "extolling her to the skies," thus misleading the people, as it was the bogus, fraudulent Illinois State Spiritualist Association, and not the State Association represented by Dr. Warne. It was found necessary in order to stop this fraudulent work, to go into court, and after months of tedious litigation, the case was decided, and the gang was enjoined from using the name. They then organized the Illinois Inter-State Spiritualist Association, selecting a name as nearly as possible like that of the Illinois State Spiritualist Association, in order to further deceive the public.

IMPORTANT, HEALERS.

To the Editor:—The Supreme Court has decided that magnetic healers must have examination and license, or be liable to a fine of $100. Now, let every healer treat his or her patients in a darkened room, in which are one or more other persons, then, let our drugopaths get their proof of the treatment, and the identity of the healer, as best they can. G. STAFFORD.
129 S. Clinton street, Chicago.

Healers Must Have Licenses.

Magnetic healers and osteopaths must procure licenses from the State Board of Health, according to a decision handed down by the Supreme Court at Springfield in the case of the people against George P. Gordon, which came from Rockford. This is the first time the court has been given an opportunity to take a stand on the question and its opinion is far-reaching.

Gordon advertised himself as a "healer" and procured business in Rockford. He was charged with practicing medicine without license, and after trial the Circuit Court directed the jury to find for the defendant. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the cause. The opinion begins by quoting that part of the statute which says:

"The examination of those who desire to practice any other system of science of treating human ailments, who do not use medicine internally or externally, and who do not practice operative surgery, shall be of a character sufficiently strict to test their qualifications as practitioners."

Continuing, the court says:

"We all agree that the object of this is to protect the sick and suffering and the community at large against the ignorant and unlearned who hold themselves possessed of peculiar skill in the treatment of disease, and to prevent them from holding themselves out to the world as physicians and surgeons without having acquired any knowledge whatever of the human system or of the disease and ailments to which it is subject. Without some knowledge of the location and offices of the various nerves, muscles, and joints, the manipulation of those parts and the flexing of the limbs cannot be intelligently, if, indeed, safely, practiced.

"Merely giving massage treatment or bathing a patient is different from advertising one's business or calling to be that of a doctor or physician, and, as such, to administer osteopathic treatment. The one probably falls within the profession of a trained nurse, while the other does not."

The Condition of Two Who Passed to Spirit Life.

I

There are many tender, pathetic scenes on this earth of ours. One half of the world doesn't know how the other half lives, and as a rule, doesn't care. While one person is laughing, another is sighing. While one is enjoying thrills of ecstatic pleasure, another has spasms of pain and the pangs of remorse. While one is happy, another is miserable. And so it goes.

The world is made up of contrasts. Every object can be contrasted with some other object. Every joy can find its contrast in pain and anguish. Every thought or wish realized finds its contrast everywhere in bitter disappointment. God even can find his contrast in the "orthodox devil." Heaven is contrasted with hell, and the salubrious climate of the former with the exceedingly hot fire of the latter. From beginning to end the world is made up of contrasts. The mote dancing in the sunbeam has its contrast in the planets careering through space. Life has its contrast with death, and the calm of a summer morning with the terrible devastation and ruin of a cyclone. The high hill looks down upon the deep valley, and Satan on the Mount tempting Jesus finds a contrast in a minister of the gospel in the valley, seducing his parishioners' wives and daughters.

II.

As the story goes as related by a daily paper in New York, there was a lady, very wealthy and apparently refined, and the center of a large circle of friends. She entertained the idea that her exclusive duty was to herself alone. Her personnel was queenly, her features just enough tinged with rainbow tinted hues to render them charmingly attractive, and when illuminated with a smile, they scintillated like the dew-drops of morn when being kissed away by the gentle rays of the sun. She was the center of admiring friends, a central orb, while those who danced attendance were the smaller satellites. With her great wealth she was never known to do a philanthropic deeds, but was ever looking for bargains—at the bargain counter, on bargain days. One day she had purchased a dress of surpassing beauty and excellence, and after it had been nicely fitted by certain minor changes, the clerk remarked that she got it so cheap because an old woman, distinguished for her exquisite needle work, had made the most of it, dying before it was completed—dying of want and starvation—a martyr in her efforts to earn an honest living.

III.

In a room in one of the most humble quarters in New York, an elderly lady, Mrs. Kate Stearns, was lying upon a cot very weak and sick. Constantly plying her needle in her efforts to gain a respectable living, at last she was compelled to yield to various privations and take to the bed. Ghastly pale, her features were ghost-like. Too weak to raise her hand to her head she seemed to be suspended midway between life and death, waiting patiently for a single move of the pulsating forces, either towards the grave or towards ultimate recovery. She was a victim of human lust; of insatiate greed; of avarice on the part of puny mortals—she was a victim of the bargain counter, a place in our large stores where human souls are sometimes sacrificed; where misery is doled out to the insatiate bargain hunter at so much per garment. These great stores are in a measure built upon human wrecks; built upon the very life-blood of women and children; built upon the moans and sighs of those who are overworked. If the bargain counter could sometimes speak, it would tell a fearful tale of poverty, hunger, wretchedness and pain. It is the receptacle of energies that are burning low among those who must work for next to nothing or starve. It simply deals in human chattels, slaves who work for a mere pittance, some earning only one dollar a week. Such is modern civilization with its bargain counter.

IV.

A dream of death! A vision of the transfiguration! A view of a new born spirit! In visions, many times, a grand lesson is conveyed. It was in the morning dawn when nature was awakening from a night's reporse, and when the eastern sky was beautifully tinged with what seemed to be slices of some exquisite rainbow, that had been chiseled into thousands of fantastic forms of great beauty and loveliness by some angel artist and sculptor. The air as pure as a sunbeam, the pendant dewdrops on the flowers seem as if distilled from the breath of angels, and the songs of birds add enchantment to the scene. On this occasion a mystic, one gifted in occult lore, had a vision, in which a divine lesson was conveyed. He found himself in a palatial residence, an invisible observer of a dying scene. The bed was surrounded by friends and relatives watching the last sad change. On one side of the bed was an angel, grandly lovely, who held in his hands a record by which the dying one was to be judged. On the other side of the bed were clustered spirit friends and relatives who had come to witness the change, and welcome the new-born spirit then in the process of formation, and when the change was completed and the spirit had awakened to consciousness, they extended their hearty good wishes and congratulations, and then endeavored to take her away from earth, but to their great surprise they could not do so, as she seemed to be weighted down to earth—tied to it in some peculiar way, and she cried in her agony of sorrow that she could not ascend higher. Then she was approached by the Angel of Light, who in tones musical with loving emotions, told her that during the whole of her earthly career she had never done an unselfish act; had never brought light, love, pleasure or comfort to any sad careworn heart; had never lifted a burden from the shoulders of any of the toiling millions; had never brought sunshine into any household; had never imparted a single substantial blessing to any struggling mortal. She had never in aspiration, in thought, in word or deed, risen above the sordid conditions of earth, and she was anchored thereto—anchored thereto until good deeds should so ennoble her that she could ascend higher.

V.

The vision continues: Another scene of wonderful impressiveness occurs. Another woman, Kate Stearns, is on her dying bed, a sad spectacle indeed. Not a solitary mortal is present. Poverty—gaunt poverty—is manifested in the room. A crust of bread is on a plate by the bed. She sends an agonizing moan bearing upon it the fruitage of a lacerated heart, of hopes and aspirations unrealized, and with a prayer upon her lips she passed into the unconscious state of death. The scene was pitiful indeed as viewed from the earthly standpoint. The same Angel of Light stood by her lonely cot, while the one who was tethered to earth by a misspent life came to assist in her transition. She was efficient, watchful and tender, and realized that if she ever escaped from the thraldom of earth, it must be through good works and kindly deeds. As soon as the dying woman had passed through the change called death, and awakened on the spirit side of life, she was greeted by a song of welcome by an angel choir, while little children showered flowers and benedictions upon her. The reception she received was grandly beautiful, as she awakened to a realization of the spirit side of life. Then the Angel of Light beckoned the spirit tethered to earth to approach, and told her to behold one whose life had been wrecked on earth by the insatiate greed of those who are attendants at the bargain counter; and he referred to the arisen spirit as the one on earth who had stitched her heart's blood away into a dress which she had bought for a mere pittance in one of the palace stores. While the victim of earth's wrongs stood forth grandly beautiful as a spirit, the one who had the insatiate greed to oppress her, though unconsciously, was tethered to earth.

VI.

Thus it is often the case that where the victims of the bargain counter enter spirit life prepared at once to advance, those who are animated with insatiate greed, will be tethered to earth for a long time after the change called death. Your life here determines your status on the spirit side of life, so look out or you, too, will be anchored to earthly conditions.

CRITICAL REFLECTIONS

On The Progressive Thinker's Symposium.

To the Editor:—I have read with much interest and I trust with equal profit every paper of the Symposium in No. 638 of your wide-awake paper, in answer to your circular letter requesting answers to the double question, "Should Spiritualism take its place among the great religions of the world, or be assigned to its proper position in the domain of science?"

Although not one of the chosen symposiasts, I shall presume to make a few suggestions touching your important and well-timed question, prefatory to what I consider the main purpose of this paper.

It seems to me the question as stated is not quite fair to both sides, if unprejudiced answers was the object desired (as I doubt not was the real intention), in the fact that it very plainly suggests the answer the writer would give, and takes the fact as granted and settled that "the domain of science is the proper position for Spiritualism to occupy. In its legal aspect the question is leading, and therefore improper in form; and considering the high position held by the questioner, it may well be claimed to have influenced some of the answers, but in reading the answers I am not inclined to think that has been the case. A few have noticed the objection, while all others have ignored it altogether.

As the question is propounded, I could not answer yes or no to either of its branches. Spiritualism has already taken its place in the world as a religion, not as "one of the great religions of the world," but built upon a new and different foundation, accepting whatever may be truth in all other religions, and discarding all that is false and obsolete. Spiritualism may truly be said to take the place of all other religions, but it does not affiliate with them.

The N. S. A. recognizes Spiritualism as a religion; the question was exhaustively discussed at its first convention at Chicago, and overwhelmingly adopted as one of its fundamental principles, or my memory is greatly at fault. Besides, all state and local societies so far as I am advised, have done the same. The question then is not in fact, shall Spiritualism take its place, etc., but shall it retain the place already taken? To change our attitude in this important matter, we must go back on our own record.

Now, as to the second branch of the question, "Shall Spiritualism be assigned?" etc. You cannot assign it at all. That Spiritualism has its scientific aspect is true, and that is one of its best and most commendable features, its real glory. True science and real Spiritualism will never come in conflict; they cannot, because they are a recent date had not furnished anything worthy of substitution.

In the matter of invocations, and prayer generally, objections may well be taken to its manner, and perhaps its substance, but not to prayer per se. Real prayer is as natural to developing humanity as real breathing, and as essential to spiritual unfoldment as the latter is to physical life and growth. Every aspiration of the soul is a prayer, "uttered or unexpressed," and every righteous act in the routine of life, performed with a good intent, is prayer materialized. Prayer is the food of the spirit. Let us pray, then, "without ceasing." Let us retain the exercise in our gatherings, but let us also correct and eliminate its objectionable borrowed features. Neither Infinite Intelligence nor any other being or power wiser than we, needs to be ordered, or specially instructed what to do, or how it shall be done. Prayer is mainly for the benefit of him who prays.

I have already made this paper much longer than I intended; but my excuse must be the importance of the subject in hand, and the multitude of its phases. I now come to the main object which prompted it.

The variety of opinions manifested in the different papers of the Symposium make it very apparent to me that we cannot all unite harmoniously in one organization; and while I regret these differences, I can perceive that they may not, if wisely met, and managed, injure the prospects of Spiritualism, but will result in its benefit in the end. It would be far better for us to divide our forces, and co-operate, so far as we can, than to remain together and wrangle over points of doctrine upon which we cannot agree.

We have disagreed quite long enough over the doctrine of "Infinite Intelligence." It is evident we cannot harmonize on that point nor upon the questions now under discussion. Neither side will yield, nor should they, if to do so would require the sacrifice of an honest opinion. These questions are vital, and their proper treatment is very important to the future of Spiritualism, as I personally view the matter.

We are numerous and strong enough to support and operate two organizations, and we can divide on these lines with honor to ourselves, and I believe, with ultimate benefit to our common cause. We are all Spiritualists, as the many denominations under one name are all Christians; and it would be far better to divide our forces, and each moiety hold together, than for individuals to withdraw who do not agree with the recognized order of things in the association, and disperse without organization. One of these results, to my mind, is inevitable.

branches or parts of the one great body of truth and must harmonize.

Other religions have ever opposed all new discoveries in science that conflicted with their creeds; and persecuted its adherents as far back as we have any record; (and what a record it is!) while Spiritualism joins hands with science in the uprearing of her magnificent superstructure of truth.

But science is not the all of Spiritualism: Oh, no, my friends and brethren; far from it! It is not even the chief stone of the corners, but yet an important one. The religion of Spiritualism recognizes and includes all things that make for righteousness, and requires them all, to fulfill its perfect law. The golden rule, even, falls short of its requirements. It also embraces a grand philosophy, the philosophy of life, of all life, past, present and to come.

But more and beyond all these, this religion recognizes and comprehends the divine aspiration of the soul that reaches out into the higher realms of being, seeking and longing to know more of its spiritual attributes, and their relation to the laws and power that govern the universe. And it is, or should be the supreme aim and object of this religion to cultivate, develop and strengthen this divine principle, which is the inheritance of all; to the end that we may more fully comprehend these laws, live within their influence and under their guidance while here; thereby preparing ourselves for the next stage of progressive life which is spiritual. This, as I understand it, is the substance of true religion as now understood, whatever may be the book definitions.

We need not be ashamed to call Spiritualism a religion, because the great religions of the world—so-called—are built, mainly upon the foundation of creeds that are rapidly becoming obsolete through spiritual enlightenment; nor because their history is recorded in blood, crime and persecution all along the pathway from the dim past up to a date that is quite recent. Evolution is working its wonders, even upon them, thanks to the immutable law of its operation. We need not adopt these creeds nor any tenet of them that does not conform to our views; we could not follow their historical example; nor is it advisable to conform to their methods in church proceedings, or in the conduct of our religious exercises. Nor do we do so to any great extent. But, while we repudiate the great mass of their leading doctrines, we should not be too pround to accept, and adopt any truth we may perchance find hidden among them. I am fully aware that a few objectionable features have crept into our religious exercises through causes so apparent they do not need special mention. In our musical exercises for instance, we are sometimes obliged to use words we do not approve, because they are set to music that we do approve; and for the further reason that our own musical literature up to Man's Aural Self.

By Charles Dawbarn.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Impression and Intuition.

The aural outreach of manhood constitutes the unbroken chain which, link by link, unites Homo as a personality with the highest conceivable expression of intelligence. If it be that a unit can only gain needed experience by blending with his fellows, then such blending will continue so long as experience is needed; and that we venture to assume will be throughout eternity. We watch Homo as a physical speck, without size and weight save in relation to the planet on which he dwells. He must be almost too minute for possible inspection by a celestial visitor. Yet Homo thinks this little speck is the whole of him, and is proud of it, in comparison with other specks everywhere around him.

This speck, of which Homo boasts himself, is but the nucleus of a wider selfhood whose home is in a dark and undiscovered continent of the unknown. Homo's studies have been confined to the speck nucleus, and he is well aware that at every moment of his earth life units are being attracted from Cosmos, and seeking their mates in his mortal form. Presently these units have gained all the experiences they need. They then flee the form, which for a brief hour has been their home, but they carry with them all those experiences which constitute what we call "identity."

Psychometric experiments prove this emanation is passing out in every direction, and taking on a form of which Homo has no experience, and therefore cannot even imagine its shape or size. A few scientific experiments at the fireside with the family sensitive will quickly demonstrate this truth. We then discover that this aural selfhood contains a center of intelligence by the fact that it not only occasionally communicates with mortal brain, but, at such times, brings with it a knowledge far beyond that of the mortal Homo. When that has been demonstrated it seems obvious that the greater the facility of intercourse the greater should be the advantage to the mortal. And such would undoubtedly be the case were it not that this emanated aura is at first little but a replica of Homo. His tastes, desires, passions, vices and virtues constitute the outgoing medley of his earth experiences. Therefore under such conditions if Homo connects with this aural self it simply makes him more of the man he has already made himself.

The man with natural or evolved contact with his aural self will always show keener wit than his fellows. He becomes a quick-firing cannon among old-fashioned smoothbores. He dominates, and often cruelly, among his fellows. The genius is always a man who has ready access to his own aural selfhood. As a Napoleon, an Attila, or one of the modern monsters of finance, he becomes a curse to himself and his fellows.

There is another side to this natural law. The man who becomes a savior of the world, a blessing to his fellow men, is first thinking thoughts of love to all. These thoughts are born by the outpassing unit into the larger selfhood. With this selfhood he is in close contact. It inspires him; enlarges him; endows him with power; and the love of him and his life record goes echoing down the ages.

So much of Nature's process, whether for good or ill to Homo, is involved in our study of spirit return through Mrs. Piper. We perceive that the outer man is but another edition, on a larger scale, of the self with whom we mingle in earth life. Just as Homo chooses and rejects associates now, so will his aural self be free of intercourse in some directions, and very shy in others. If Mrs. Piper, for instance, were fond of mechanics or music her aural self would become easy of access to intelligences with similar tastes. Others might be admitted into association, but would find greater difficulty in expressing themselves. Had Mrs. Piper been a natural linguist we can see that M. A. Oxon might have readily recalled his missing knowledge of Greek. It being granted that the vibration induced by the energy of thought always demands interpretation according to somebody's experience, we see that the outer man will necessarily prove the most effective interpreter. The experiences of the mortal must mostly pass to him, even though his experiences can but imperfectly be interpreted by Homo. The ignorant medium may thus present certain harmonies that, controlled by the aural self, would permit expressions of learning by a visitor; but if herself educated and developed, the spirit finds access to memories and experiences that permit him a much fuller expression.

The nucleus of progress is found within the mortal form. The man of genius has aural powers far beyond the normal, and is really a mortal sensitive, inspired by aural manhood to a still greater development of his mortal powers of expression. But such men and women would be very impatient over any effacement of their own selfhood, even for a brief hour. Consciousness is for them the pride of life. Thus the world will find very few of its talented workers, such for instance as Miss Whiting, ever becoming an unconscious medium. The unconscious medium is, with rare exception, on a lower level of intellectual development and training. We can easily imagine a Sir William Crookes as particularly interested in some phenomenon evolved through his own organism. But both he and the world would be losers were he to let his own developed intelligence stand aside that another Ego might take its place. True development means the growth of Homo into a larger manhood by personal effort, and not by going to sleep that another may use his form. We thus reverse the popular idea of mediumship. The unconscious and entranced medium is Homo robbed of his birthright, perhaps for the benefit of others, but all the same he becomes a sacrifice for public good with little benefit to himself. Mrs. Piper has learned no lesson from her repeated entrancements. It is S. P. R. and the student who are the gainers through the smothering of her selfhood.

Every sensitive, conscious or unconscious, is making greater draft on his vital energy than the plodding unemotional mortal afraid of a new idea. The use of his organism, even by his own aural self, is exhausting, and can only be moderately indulged with safety. Miss Whiting interprets her own lassitude as the fatigue of her spirit visitor. It was the mortal who needed the rest, whether by cessation of the intercourse or by change of occupation.

As we apply these truths to the production of physical phenomena we can almost grade their effect upon the life of the mortal. The rap demands vibratory energies the spirit could not supply. The physical force used is thus, perforce, that of the mortal, who also supplies much of the intelligence. The professional rappist becomes a sleepy fellow, and the victim of influences round him. And when we pass on through all forms of physical phenomena down to the enormous physical draft upon the mortal demanded by so-called "materialization," we find an arrested growth of manhood. The intelligence exhibited is of the earth, earthy. A certain almost barbarian shrewdness is present, but the intellectual level permits fraud, and easily makes dupes of the onlookers. The witness may protect himself. Sir William Crookes held Katie King and her invisible associates to scientific exactness. He thus demonstrated the tremendous fact of human immortality and spirit return. But he had then exhausted the value of the phenomena for himself. The sensitive was simply more sensitive than before. Her own selfhood had not been raised by such experiences. She passed out from his scientific protection to often become the victim of influences, seen and unseen, that gathered around her. Sir William Crookes profited by his experiences, and the world has shared his gain. But, so far as the world knows, the sensitive remains in her old level, with no advance, because all growth depends upon self effort. And self effort would have prevented entrancement.

So we would grade mediumship as, first, that which is preceded or followed by self effort; and, secondly, the variety which leaves the mortal little the better, and often the worse for the use of her organism. It is true both classes of mediumship may be utilized for some benefit to the world, but nevertheless, the one should be encouraged and the other, as far as possible, avoided.

We closed our last chapter with the assertion that Nature had provided a way of communication between the two worlds that did not demand this constant sacrifice of mortal manhood. But it has its demands, which must be obeyed. It demands first of all the cultivation of a faculty which is rarely more than a tendency in the normal life of to-day. We have already pointed the student to the fact that his size is not limited to that of his mortal form. There has been a perpetual outgoing of the units that have constituted the personality by which he is known among his fellow men. Let us see what that means. These units carry with them their intelligence, their energy, their experiences; and by Nature's eternal law, continue to blend as before. Of the new form appropriate to these conditions we know nothing; but we do know that it has and must have a center to its blended intelligence whereby the whole personality may be directed in its aural relations. Since this form, which we have called the oral or outer self, is thus a second or larger Homo, with perpetual intercourse one way, it must be far better conditioned for discharging its thoughts into Homo's mortal brain than are intelligences dominating another personality.

We have noted that exceptional talent in earth life is marked by its occasional access to the aural self, which when recognized is called "intuition." The genius receives such thought blindly, and grades no highway for others to follow. Impressions are similar thoughts, but only half interpreted. The man or woman without impressions is an impossibility. Every one has so much of access to his own aura. The impression is the imperfectly sensed thought flash, and often effective to save life, or arouse curiosity and enquiry. Intuition is a step in advance of impression. The thought received is realized, interpreted and acted upon. It has always been counted as a blessing to the mortal, whatever its source. But that intuition can be cultivated as much as memory, or any other faculty, has not been realized. Yet herein is the pathway, the only natural, normal pathway for intercourse between the two worlds.

It may be said to be almost universally acknowledged to-day, that exchange of thought between intelligences demands similarity of vibration. But since thought itself is only sensed as vibration, the thought and its vibration are literally the same as an echo is the vibratory repetition of a preceding sound. Nature may echo sound, but she cannot at the same time echo an interpretation of that sound. There must be an agreed meaning to that sound before its intelligence can be recognized and interpreted. So there will be no passage of intelligence from one form to another save so far as the experience is mutual. The scientist cannot even talk to me in the terms of his craft if I cannot interpret their meaning.

It is certain that our aural self is living amid conditions and gaining experiences of which the mortal knows nothing. Therefore those conditions and experiences cannot be expressed in vibratory thoughts for our benefit. On the other hand, our mortal experiences and conditions are all capable of being interpreted by the aural self. That self has individually already had such experiences, and therefore can think them now; if not exactly in the same vibration, yet in some octave that is his present sense expression.

We have thus, once again, marked the extent and limit of possible intercourse between the inner and the outer self, but there will be no satisfactory intercourse at all, beyond impression and intuition, unless the mortal be willing to study and fulfill the requisite conditions. He cannot reduce this interchange of thought to the normal level of his earth life. Such vibrations must, for the most part, be impossible to the aural self in his present condition. At best it must be the spirit of his thought which will pass inward from his mortal center of intelligence. The thought has become concentrated. Its vibration means just one thing, and nothing else. It both travels and can be interpreted. This is but saying that concentration is necessary for all outgoing vibrations by which the mortal would express his thought to the invisible. So much has been taught by Eastern sages from time immemorial. It is the first, and a very important stage in the proposed communication. It becomes, as we have seen, automatic in times of great danger and unusual trial. In ecclesiastical phrase such concentration is called "prayer from the heart." It is heard because the thought is concentrated into an effective vibration. The printed prayer, and the usual pulpit "talk with God" are vibrated thoughts impossible of interpretation by any higher intelligence. They are vibrations too feeble to travel. So the first essential for the student is intense earnestness. Nothing less will do in this quest. Herein is no question of conditions for particular phenomena so strenuously sought by the Spiritualist when seeking to interview a ghost. Unless the student realizes that he is beginning the most important quest possible to mortal life he can vibrate no thought that will be effective.

Strange as it may seem, he must now prepare the aural self for his coming effort. Unless he is living a life worthy of his manhood the opening he seeks would result in an added power to his degradation. The consequence could only be what we call "black magic." Let us demonstrate this all-essential truth. The aural self is composed of units, outgoing from the mortal form. That form is his own evoluted selfhood passed into new conditions. Its construction has been the work of years, with every moment busy. Such a fabric cannot be changed in an hour. Even if the mortal should in some fortunate hour experience the marvelous "change of heart," as it is called, by which his tastes, desires, aspirations are suddenly polarized into a noble manhood, his work has but begun. It will be, must be long before the aural self can respond. It has been created out of the raw material he has supplied day by day, and, as a consequence, he will often find impressions and intuitions flashed to him, as he believes, by the devil and evil spirits. In reality, as the student will now recognize, the converted sinner is only reaping just what he has himself sown. He is receiving the echo of his own experiences, thus recalling him to his own past. The more sensitive he is, the more he has of such experiences, which are, perhaps, almost unknown to the average sinner who becomes a respectable citizen, and probably a venerated church member. The echoes are necessarily from his own past, just as a Lilian Whiting, from her higher level, personifies her beloved Kate Field. A bright spirit might be present for the poor sensitive, but he is almost sure to interpret her vibratory sensations in terms of his own past, and thus, too often, once again finds himself in the hells of his own creation.

Such is what we mean when we assert that the mortal who would open intercourse with his aural self had better first be assured that he has impregnated that self with constant aspirations for a higher and nobler manhood. He must begin by self effort, mastering his own passions, ruling his own tastes, crushing his own selfishness; and, by his thoughts, seeking fellowship with all that expresses his highest ideal. Those known to history as Saviors of their race have always worked with the added power of their own aural selfhood, long trained and infused with the divinity of manhood.

Abandon the Old Trail.

I have been an interested reader of the numerous articles which have appeared in recent numbers of The Progressive Thinker, very much of which I heartily endorse and approve. There are some things, however, that present themselves to my mind as objectionable, ludicrously inconsistent, and out of place is a continual rehearsal of old worn-out religious and theological phrases.

It seems to be impossible for them to grow out and above their old religion. Why can they not step out of the old clothes and don new garments that are more befitting them, and show themselves to the world in a new garb?

They talk about Spiritualism in the garments of old theological phraseology as though there were not words in the English vocabulary in which they could clothe their thoughts. If that is true, coin new ones and define them as well as you can, and abandon the old trail.

I see that some are talking about "the great first cause." To my mind there is no such thing as "first cause" relating to the universe. It is difficult to conceive of a first cause for something that has eternally existed; if there was a first cause, there was a beginning and the probable inference would be that in the sequel there must be an end. There have been floods of ink spread upon paper in an effort to show the existence of a personal God, without which religion could have no place upon which to stand. Hence the mighty effort put forth to maintain that position; the vocabulary of various languages have been ransacked to find words to use in the discussion with the seeming hope of befogging the mind they have failed to enlighten.

The idea of demonstrating such a problem is utterly out of the question; the finite will never be able to fathom the infinite.

A MOTHER'S HAND CURE.

I don't believe in hypnotists nor am I much inclined
To bank on certain people who manipulate your mind,
I view the Christian scientists who cure my broken arm
By bidding me "forget it" with a species of alarm,
The Buddhist cult and magic are not patronized by me
And I flee the mental healer with extreme alacrity,
But there's an old-time method that my sure respect commands,
When I think how mother cured me by the laying on of hands.

For mother's hands were slender, but a most peculiar might Lay in their application, and they fitted very tight.
My "errors" and "delusions" all were smoked out on the spot
And vanished in a flame of fire, for mother's hand was hot.
There are certain thoughts and principles no doubt that do you good
And troubles oft may be allayed by Christian fortitude,
But it's wise to call a doctor when you have a colic pain
And I don't believe those people who declare it's all your brain,
That when you're tied up kinky in a double twisted knot
You've only got to think you're right and be so on the spot.
I'm fain to take such people with their "thinks" and "praying bands,"
And cure them as my ma cured me, by laying on of hands.

Could they but lie across her knee as once I used to lie
Their disbelief in misery away would quickly fly,
Their "errors" and "delusions" would be smoked out on the spot,
They'd howl with very real pain, for mother's hand was hot.

Restores Eyesight

"Actina," a Wonderful Discovery Which Cures Diseased Eyes, No Matter Whether Chronic or Acute, Without Cutting or Drugging.

There is no need for cutting, drugging or probing the eye for any form of disease, for a new system of treating afflictions of the eye has been discovered whereby all torturous and barbarous methods are eliminated. This wonderful treatment takes the form of a Pocket Battery and is known as "Actina." It is purely a home treatment and self-administered by the patient. There is no risk of experimenting, as thousands of people have been cured of blindness, failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids and other afflictions of the eye through this grand discovery, when eminent oculists termed the cases incurable. This wonderful remedy also makes the use of spectacles unnecessary, as it not only removes the weakened and unnatural conditions of the eye, but gives it a clear vision.

A. O. T. Pennington, Massachusetts building, Kansas City, Mo., says: "Actina," cured my mother of cataracts and cured me of asthma.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

Lee Warner, a young farmer residing near Matthews, Ind., announced that, aided by a dream, he has solved the perpetual motion problem. A few nights ago he had the mystery solved to him in a dream, and, getting out of bed, began to work on lines framed in the dream. For forty-eight hours he claims that he has had a machine making 600 revolutions per minute, and the machine is still at work. The invention is not yet completed, and Warner will give none of the details.—Chicoga Inter Ocean.

Arthur F. Nursey, inspirational lecturer and test medium, is open for engagements. Those wishing his services, address him at No. 404 Forest street, Wausau, Wis. Terms reasonable.

Louis E. Richter, a prominent farmer, died at his home, at Mascoutah, Ill., suddenly of heart disease. Several months ago a Gypsy told him his fortune, and among other things said that he would die suddenly within six months. He frequently told his friends that he believed the prophecy would come true. It is believed that worry brought on his death. He was a member of the Board of Supervisors of St. Clair county.—Chicago Chronicle.

Mr. D. Sibert, Applegate, Cal., writes: "Will you be so kind as to print my recipe for a cough and cold remedy. I have used it for twenty-five years with complete satisfaction: Raw linseed oil, tincture of best ginger, old strained honey; the three in equal parts. Sure cure. Any further particulars as to preparation will be given on receipt of two-cent stamp."

The residence of Oliver E. Erb, of Martic township, Pa., was saved from destruction by fire through a dream. Mr. Erb awoke after dreaming the house was on fire, and was so impressed by the incident that he went down stairs to investigate. To his utter astonishment he found the kitchen in flames. He put out the fire, which in a short time must have enveloped the house.

F. L. Jobson writes from Richmond, Va.: "It has been a pleasure as well as a benefit to our society to have had with us Mrs. H. C. Webber, of Boston, for the past three Sundays. She came to us a stranger, and by her fine lectures, beautiful teachings of spiritual philosophy and most excellent proofs of spirit return, has won the gratitude and love of our society."

Mrs. Alice Baker, lecturer and message medium, of Cleveland, Ohio, writes: "I am in St. Louis, Mo., for a few weeks. I lectured last Sunday evening for the First Spiritual Church to a good and appreciative audience. I will speak for it again next Sunday. Bro. Peck, now at the Florida Camp, is their pastor. These people are a whole soul spiritual people. I will answer calls within one hundred miles of St. Louis, officiate at funerals, and any society on or near the Big Four Railroad, between here and Cleveland, withing my services on my return trip, please correspond with me at once. Terms reasonable. I am also open for camp engagements. Address all communications to 3928 Morgan street, St. Louis, Mo., or to home address, 261 Pearl street, Cleveland, Ohio."

Hamilton DeGraw writes: "The symposium that has been presented to the readers of The Progressive Thinker has certainly been to those who are interested in the effort to more perfectly understand the Spiritual philosophy, a feast fit for the immortals. While perusing the different articles and noting the variety of thought expressed, the motto that would be the most appropriate to adopt by the adherents of the different lines of thought there expressed, would be: 'In essentials, unity; non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity. An uncle of mine living in Missouri, and to whom I have sent copies of The Progressive Thinker, writes me that a clergyman of his acquaintance told him that he did not attend church often enough, and he told him that if he would preach a sermon from the text, 'Do unto others as you would have others do unto you,' he would go and hear it. The reply of the clergyman was that there was not enough material in it to make a sermon. He must have been a blind leader not to be able to recognize the great resources in that text, and how important it is that human beings obey the spirit of truth as it is given in that instruction."

C. E. Quinlan writes from Evanston, Ill.: "Our seance last evening by Mr. and Mrs. Elmo was another great success. We had a circle of 24. That is doing well for a town like Evanston. I am sure we will succeed in increasing greatly in numbers. A great deal of interest is manifested, and by some of the very best people of the place."

Mrs. C. A. Rodgers writes that she has the eight premium books, and that they are a continual pleasure. She says: "It was a grand thought when you made the price within the reach of the poorest."

Mrs. E. P. Fralick writes from Waverly, N. Y.: "Mrs. E. H. Messersmith, formerly of Rochester, N. Y., now of Hanover, Pa., gave us two lectures on Sunday, the 16th. She is a lady of culture, honest and conscientious. We hope she will be coming this way again."

G. H. Brooks writes: "I closed my first month's work with the Unity society of Milwaukee, Wis., on last Sunday. The attendance has been good. The socials have been very largely attended. The State Society meets in Milwaukee on April 15, and it is expected there will be a good attendance. I will respond to calls for funerals. Address me at No. 641 Hackett avenue, Milwaukee, Wis."

W. H. Harlow writes from Erie, Pa.: "We are doing fairly well this winter fighting for our cause. We have had Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague and Mrs. Clara Watson, and this month we have F. C. White, of Lily Dale. The passing away of Sidney Kelsey on January 22, takes one of our oldest newspaper editors and Spiritualists in this city. After going to the postoffice and getting his mail he fell dead at the home of his daughter. He was 80 years of age. He was an honest and good man. George B. Littington also passed away at 18 years of age, of typhoid fever. F. Cordon White gave words of comfort to the family and friends. Mr. White goes from here to Buffalo."

Columbus Wells expresses his opinion as follows: "If a man was seen praying to a tree or rock for the forgiveness of his sins, he would be considered crazy; and yet he would be just as sensible as the man that prays to a God, a Creator, an Infinite Intelligence or a Sea of Intelligence. The above named Gods are only the thoughts of men. I cannot believe there is a power above nature. Nature contains all that was, all that is, and all that ever will be; not one atom is added or diminished. In my opinion there is no such thing as a first cause."

E. W. Sprague and wife, missionaries for the N. S. A., writes: "We are again in Indiana and wish to hear from every society and every locality where our services are needed. We especially desire to visit every weak society in the state and hope to hear from them at once so as to arrange our route. We have a little time still open for camp engagements. Address us at Rochester, Ind."

Parkersburg, W. Va.,—J. A. Bee today found a handful of old Spanish coins in a remarkable manner. Last night he dreamed that the ghost of a murdered peddler appeared to him and bade him follow. He followed the man and, after crossing the Little Kanawha River and going in all seven miles, the ghost pointed out to him in a secluded spot a pot of gold and silver coins. The spirit told him he would there find the hidden treasure. When he awoke the dream seemed so realistic and impressed him so deeply that Mr. Bee went the same course he had taken in the dream, found everything as it had appeared during the night and when he reached the spot found a number of old Spanish coins and several pieces of what he thinks is gold ore. He has exhibited the coins and the ore, but refuses to locate the spot. He will have the ore assayed and, if it is good, he will try to buy the property.—Chicago American.

The Spiritualistic Society of Ashtabula, Ohio, are desirous to enter into communication with lecturers and platform test mediums, to officiate in their city if close to the vicinity or passing through. Address Jos. Konrad, secretary, 143 Center street, Ashtabula Ohio.

L writes from Detroit, Mich.: "The Earnest Workers were addressed on Thursday last by Mrs. Marian Carpenter. The fish pond on March 20, will be a jolly event to drop coin for the cause. The Ladies' Aid has just finished thirty yards of carpet, sold it and banked the money. The cause in Detroit is flourishing."

Mrs. S. S. Rockhill writes from Alliance, Ohio: "Yesterday closed the engagement of Mrs. Coffman with the Independent Church Society, for the month of February. She came to us a stranger, but goes away a loved and loving sister. Her lectures are of a high order, and the test work very convincing and satisfactory. For March and perhaps April we are to have Mrs. Dr. Dudley. I want to acknowledge the receipt of A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. I thank you for the valuable present. It is a most wonderful book, a thought prompter, and must do good."

Harry J. Moore, of Rochester, Ind., wishes to announce that he would be pleased to correspond with camp associations in view of engaging his services for the ensuing camp season. Mr. Moore has lectured in Chicago, and he left a very favorable impression.

Mrs. Louis Duhl writes from Elmira, N. Y.: "Mary C. Von Kanzler has just closed her engagement with us for the month of February, which has met with more than gratifying success. She now goes to fill a two months' engagement at Indianapolis, Ind., after which she will return to us as permanent pastor in our own church home. We now have the brick edifice to which we aspired, and will soon hold the dedication services. For the month of March we have Tillie U. Reynolds, whom we will gladly welcome into our midst, for she, too, occupies a warm place in our hearts. We expect to dedicate our new home about the last of May, when we hope to have Mrs. Van Kanzler, Mrs. Reynolds and Rev. Moses Hull with us."

G. S. Klock writes from Lincoln, Neb.: "We, Spiritualists of Lincoln, Neb., have had Max Hoffman, of Chicago, with us ever since the Nebraska State Camp-meeting, and we have had the greatest interest in Spiritualism manifested by the people that we have ever had. He has worked hard and faithfully for six months, and has attracted more people from the different churches than any medium we ever had with us. For Mr. Hoffman's brilliant and attractive qualities in his mediumship the Spiritualists presented him with a gold star swung by a small chain attached to a pin, with his name inscribed on the same. This we wished him to wear upon his breast to indicate the rank and honor we bestowed upon him. The star was the only appropriate medal we could find that would illustrate his goodness in the work, and our love and respect for him."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Rev. Nellie S. Baade writes from Detroit, Mich.: "I gave two months to the Philosophical Society of Detroit, and the meetings were a good success. I gave four Sundays to the Jackson society; had large audiences. I also gave them two test socials for the benefit of the society. They were well attended. The Indian maiden who gave the messages made no mistakes. From Jackson I attended the midwinter convention at Battle Creek. It was a grand success, and everyone seemed at their best but myself. I was decidedly ill on Sunday. Upon my return home Monday I found two funerals awaiting me, one a lady from Port Huron, and a Dr. Simpson of Detroit. As both funerals were at the same day and hour, I decided to officiate at the one in Detroit. Since then I have been confined to the house with a severe cold, but am now convalescent, and hope to soon be as well as usual. As the season has so far advanced I have decided to accept a few more calls out of the city, so if any societies are in need of a lecturer and test medium, I would be pleased to engage with them upon the most reasonable terms."

The Detroit Tribune speaks as follows of the Spiritualist meeting at Battle Creek, Mich.: "The sessions of the mid-winter meeting of the State Spiritualist Association here are drawing big crowds. This afternoon E. W. Sprague of Jamestown, N. Y., spoke of Spiritualism as a live religion and a true science. Fraud and deceit in mediums, he claimed, was often caused by thoughts of fraud directed toward them. Mental suggestion would kill or cure anybody, he said, and people must therefore have charity for the medium. There are sixty different kinds of mediums, he said, including those of psychometry, message bearers, materializing and many others. Mr. Sprague said he would like to put DeWitt Talmage under test conditions and expose him as a fraud on account of his declarations against Spiritualism."

Mrs. M. Baker tells of a test given by Mrs. St. Omer Briggs, at Detroit, Mich.: "She took from the stand a lady's glove, which was laid there before Mrs. Briggs entered the hall. She said: 'Lady, there comes to me the spirit of a young lady who had only passed to spirit life but a short time, and she brings you a message thanking you for the kindness you bestowed on her in her sickness; also the way you so carefully laid out her remains. She also says that she was with you yesterday when you, Jessie and mamma went to look at her picture you are having enlarged, and that it did not please any of you, but you wanted it changed.' The lady quickly responded and said the test was true."

Alfred Curtis writes: "At the meeting of the Progressive Spiritual Society, Feb. 16, held at North avenue and Burling street, a gentleman arose and announced to the public that he had caused during the past few weeks on different occasions, 24 friends of his to be present at our services. The 24 friends received public tests from our pastor, Mrs. W. Hilbert, and the gentleman found upon enquiry that out of the 24 tests given, 19 of the same were vouched for as absolutely correct. Anyone wishing a verification of this statement can be introduced to the gentleman by applying to me. It is almost needless to say that this same gentleman became a member of the Progressive Society. Now I would ask your readers if they do not think this gentleman's policy a good one? I myself say if you wish to attend a service or join a society, why not use the same practical test on the pastor or medium? It proved to that gentleman our pastor was of the right kind and he at once became a member of the Progressive Society. If your readers would follow out the same lines I think it would bring wonderful results."

J. H. Fleming writes from Neodesha, Kans.: "We desire to let the readers of The Progressive Thinker know that the cause of Spiritualism is not sleeping in sunny Kansas. On Wednesday, Nov. 27, a series of lectures on Spiritualism were begun by that veteran worker, Rev. D. W. Hull, president of the K. S. A., assisted by Mrs. Sara Scovel, of Galena, Kans. Mrs. Scovell's work is grand, her language terse, her personality lovable and magnetic. This medium is not selfish or niggardly with her gifts and she does not belong to that class of mediums who fear they will do too much or who compute their services at so many dollars per test. She won the confidence and respect of all who heard her. As for Bro. Hull, no words of mine can do him justice. His lectures on Biblical Spiritualism are just calculated to awaken deepest interest where most good can be accomplished His lectures compel thought; his argument is logical and he holds the attention and respect of his audiences to the end. He should have more work and above all more compensation for his work. The phenomena of Spiritualism is the proof of spirit return, but there is a vast difference between the Spiritualism that combines the religion, the philosophy and the phenomena, and that which drags our cause down to the level of a vaudeville spiritual show. A local association, auxiliary to the state and N. S. A., was formed, and on Friday evening, Nov. 29, the first ordination under the Kansas State Association was given. Mrs. C. Belle Flemming, who has been the principal medium of a local circle for the past four years, was the recipient of the honor. The ceremony was performed by President Hull and Mrs. Sara Scovell, and was beautiful and impressive. The local association has a membership of over twenty devoted and determined souls, and we look to the future with hope and to past schooling with thankfulness for its lessons."

"Reader" writes: "In the absence of our beloved pastor, Moses Hull, Mrs. A. G. Atcheson, one of Buffalo's well known and very much thought of mediums, has just completed one month's engagement with the First Spiritual Church of Buffalo, N. Y. Mrs. Atcheson delivered two addresses each Sunday, followed both times with messages from the spirit world. The addresses and messages were so beautifully delivered that even if one did not have any knowledge of Spiritualism they could not go away without making a resolution of some kind. I am sure that the First Spiritual Society of Buffalo ought to feel proud of having a person like Mrs. Atcheson in their midst. Besides her regular work for the month she succeeded in taking in eight new members, all of whom were converts of hers and also gave a literary and musical entertainment at her own expense for the benefit of the church, which was largely patronized and netted the society a nice little sum. Mrs. Atcheson is an earnest and sincere worker for the cause and too much cannot be said in her praise. Her last evening on the platform the president extended her a vote of thanks in behalf of the society, to which she responded in a very pleasing manner. She was also presented with a very beautiful bouquet of flowers."

The Pittsburg (Pa.) Leader has the following: "Had the spirits of Ed and Jack Biddle stalked into the circle of Spiritualists who meet each Sunday afternoon under the charge of Rev. M. Oles, of Allegheny, on the day following their deaths, not one of that circle would have been astonished. Disembodied spirits frequently do that very thing, according to Mr. Oles. Sometimes they do not exactly know whether or not they have passed from the mortal to the immortal state. But the Biddles did not do this. The supposition is that they found that they were really dead and didn't have to hunt information on that score. It is the teaching of Spiritualism that hell is what we make it; the orthodox notion of a place where flames are forever burning and yet never consuming, is rejected by Spiritualists. They cannot reconcile it with their conception of a merciful Creator. So that the Biddle boys are not, according to the belief of Spiritualists, in hell. But they may not be in heaven, either; at least not in the higher degree of spiritual bliss which is the Spiritualist conception of heaven. There are degrees of perfection in the after life; the Biddles must attain more to the God-like character in the beyond before they can be said to be enjoying the fullness of spiritual bliss. In other words, the hereafter is one continuous spiritual growth; and all souls either grow or remain in the state in which the spiritual life was entered upon. And the degree of growth marks the degree of capability to enjoy the pleasures of a heavenly existence. It is possible for the Biddle boys to converse, through a medium, with friends whom they left behind with such precipitousness. Rev. Mr. Oles says under proper conditions the brothers could talk with relatives. But it is not every medium who could transmit the message; nor can any medium of his own will bring the spirits of the brothers into communication with earthly friends. The spirits must seek the medium; when this is done any medium, under the right conditions, says Mr. Oles, could receive messages from the spirit. So far as Mr. Oles knows neither Ed nor Jack has made strenuous spiritual efforts to get back to Pittsburg. But he would not be surprised to hear that communication had been had by other mediums with the dead brothers. Mr. Oles deplores the tragedy on the Butler county highway as adding crime to crime. For he believes it wrong to take human life under any circumstances. He is opposed to capital punishment on any grounds and from every standpoint. Murderers sent into eternity with curses on their lips and malice in their heart have the power, in after life, to so influence living men and women that these will become murderers in turn. It should be the object of law to reform the criminal, rather than take his life while he is still in his crimes. For that reason he believes it to have been a woeful mistake to have killed the Biddles."

Members of the Psychic Research Class send the following: "In consideration of the good work of Rev. P. C. Mills, State President of the Spiritualists Association of Washington, in organizing the Psychic Research Society of Bellingham Bay, we, the members, take this means of giving expression of our appreciation of his untiring efforts in our behalf, and to his worth as a man of many good qualities and exceptional ability in his chosen line of work. During his stay among us he has made many warm friends, and best wishes will follow him wherever duty may call. We esteem Brother Mills one of the best lecturers and organizers along the lines of new thought we have ever met."

Frank T. Ripley, lecturer and test medium, is serving the society at Wheeling, West Va., for the five Sundays in March. He has open time for April, May and June. He can be engaged for camp-meetings for June and July. Address all letters to care of the General Delivery, Wheeling, West Va.

Mrs. John Brown, Sr., writes from Santa Monica, Cal.: "Our beautiful philosophy is being promulgated in this little city by Mrs. Mae E. R. Hunt, who opened her first meeting, Feb. 23, in I. O. O. F. Hall. Her work lies in giving platform messages and inspirational lectures, also readings, and she expects to hold a series of meetings here as the weather will permit. This is the initiatory step to her independent work, which will be heard from later. As the season develops and sends forth its buds and blossoms, likewise the gifts of this medium will be dispensed to humanity. She holds credentials of ordination from the Harmonial and Truthseekers societies of Los Angeles, and is one of the highly sensitized instruments in the hands of the highest powers to teach their philosophy and science to the needy in city, nook or dale. There seems to be quite an interest among the people here to hear and know of the truth, whether 'a man die shall he live again,' and it is the purpose to hold these meetings every Sunday evening in Santa Monica, while her residence is Los Angeles, 307 W. 7th street, where her many friends and all who wish to know or address her will be welcome."

Dr. Geo. B. Warne and Mrs. Dr. Warne returned last week from the St. Paul state meeting, where they lectured. They pronounced it a decided success.

Mrs. L. J. Vaughn has been engaged for the season by the First Spiritual Mission Society and will conduct the services at their hall, 3265 Rhodes ave., every Sunday afternoon at 3 and evening at 8. The society has arranged for a course of lectures during the season, on the history and growth of Spiritualism and mediumship frm the time of the prophets to the present day. Each lecture to be followed by tests and messages from spirit friends.

B. G. Sweet writes from Empire City, Kans.: "It seems that our little town of Empire City, Kan., has been wonderfully blessed this winter by the influences from the heavenly spheres, first through Brother D. W. Hull, who set the people to reading their Bibles and thinking, then that old pioneer medium, Dr. Louis Schlesinger, who was the guest of the writer and his wife during his one week's stay in our city. In justice to Dr. Schlesinger and his guides, I must say, to myself and my wife, also to the many people who came to him for a reading, the straight cut and convincing tests that he gave were indisputable and convincing."

A WRONG DOCTRINE.

Misery and Suffering Are Not Beneficial.

There has on several occasions and by different writers, appeared in The Progressive Thinker articles in which the position is taken that misery and suffering are advantageous and that they are essential to the progress of the human race. This argument is again announced by Mr. Wettstein in reply to Mr. Severance, in a late number of The Progressive Thinker. It requires but little reflection to see where such an argument logically leads to. I do not believe in the validity of it. If suffering is beneficial, then, instead of attempting to remove or alleviate it, we should promote and augment it because of its salutary results. If it is edifying to have pain, it would be more so to increase it, and mankind would make more rapid progress if their diseases were multiplied and their discomforts were more acute. Then poverty is a greater blessing than wealth, and the savage with his single blanket—or no blanket at all—should feel more pride than the aristocratically clothed man in his dress suit.

There is no stable foundation for any such belief. All the efforts and experience of the race contradict it. It cannot be shown that an earthquake or a cyclone is needful to man's happiness, or that poverty is more to be desired than wealth. It cannot be proven that any one ever lost anything by not having the small-pox or yellow fever; or that ill health is essential to develop the highest type of man. The well fed civilizee is far more competent and superior in every way to the half-starved barbarian, nor is it needful that he should suffer the pangs of hunger to realize that he occupies the better position. It is the tramp that walks the ties while the man of wealth rides in the palace car and feels at the time how pleasant it is to do so.

Let us have done then with this old theological doctrine that sorrow and suffering are blessings and that the Lord sends them because he loves us. The pauper is debarred from choice by deficiency, but the rich can select to feast on honey and clothe himself in fine linen and there is where the smile comes in.

Man's progress was accelerated when he began to have confidence in himself and schemed to avoid the calamities of nature and rejected the interference of providence with his designs. When they first began to build canals in Europe there was a loud outcry from the clergy, who denounced the enterprise as sacrilegious. They said: Had not God shown where the water should run? What importance and self-estimation in man to assume to know better than God! What sinful effrontery to take out of God's hands his design. The argument that it would be convenient for man's purpose to alter God's plan was simply blasphemous.

So all the calamities of nature that affright and rend us for our benefit we will willingly forego, and if we can counter them in any way we shall not hesitate to do so, even though priests teach that the Lord chasteneth those that he loveth. We will not pass under the rod if we can go around it. We need no judgment to afflict us; no visitation of divine providence to whip us into beatific conditions and purify our souls by humiliating distress. We will thrive best under good health and reach greater heights by the promptings of hope.

Sunshine and blue skies will awaken more aspiration and encourage more effort than all the fogs that oppress the soul and shut out the bright landscape of consolation. Melancholy is not the soil in which optimism finds root. The vital strength that makes it a joy to live springs from favorable environment and exemption from the disasters that wound and confuse us. Humanity is not lifted by impediments; but by the bright glow of hope; the kind word that touches the heart, the loving smile that awakens fresh effort, are the regenerating impulses that expand the being and give birth to a new age and happier seasons. MICHIGAN.

Mid-Winter Convention of the State Association.

The ninth annual mid-winter meeting of the Michigan State Spiritualists' Association convened at Battle Creek, February 7, 8 and 9. Although the weather was cold and stormy, the attendance at each session far exceeded expectations, and at the Sunday services the hall was unable to accommodate the immense crowds, and many were obliged to stand. The speakers and mediums who took part in the program to make this meeting one long-to-be remembered were Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, missionaries for the N. S. A.; Dr. Julia M. Walton, Dr. W. O. Knowles, Mrs. Nellie S. Baade, Dr. P. T. Johnson, Mrs. Dorothy Dailey, Mrs. Marion Carpenter, Dr. A. B. Spinney, Mrs. A. Ferris and Mrs. Lillie Piper. All did admirable work and deserve much praise, but time and space will not permit special mention of each of these, but we must speak of the work of E. W. Sprague. On hearing him, one cannot fail to be impressed with his earnestness and the interest and self-sacrificing spirit he has already shown in the cause.

Saturday morning the subject for conference was "Organization," and we wish every Spiritualist in our State could have heard and accepted his helpful suggestions on same, and not wait until you have been a Spiritualist forty years, and then not willing to help maintain a society. Brother Sprague tells us he has met several "fossils" of this type, but we trust few of this class may be found in our beloved State. Sunday evening he gave a lecture on "Spiritualism of the Bible," and your scribe took notice of the fact that many pencils were busy making note of the passages of Scripture in which were to be found accounts of spiritual manifestations. Such lectures always make a good impression on church-going people, as the Spiritualists have been accused of discarding the Bible in toto. Brother Sprague also showed his interest in the cause in a more substantial way by raising funds for the M. S. S. A. to the amount of $111.45 to assist in carrying on the work of organizing new societies. Many thanks to him.

Sunday afternoon immediately following the lecture, the president ordained Mrs. Dorothy Daily, of Detroit, a new worker to many of us, but one we feel will be a great help in this grand cause. A very impressive christening service for the infants of Mrs. Fulgum and Mrs. Andrews was performed by Mrs. Carpenter, and as a ceremony of this kind had never been witnessed by many in the audience, it was very much enjoyed.

The tests and messages given by the several mediums were very convincing to skeptics and satisfying to the Spiritualists, and we feel that phenomena are a great factor in the success of these State Conventions.

These mid-winter meetings are social sessions only, hence I can report no business transacted. Harmony and good feeling prevailed during the entire session, and we can truthfully say the ninth annual mid-winter convention will go on record as one of the most successful, both financially and spiritually, in the history of the M. S. S. A.

A SPIRITUAL SCIENCE.

Aftermath of The Progressive Thinker's Symposium.

To the Editor:—May the writer be permitted a small space in which to offer a few thoughts, neither new nor startling, yet to the writer vitally important, concerning the much discussed and much misunderstood power that has turned the musty theologic thought of the ages upside down and inside out, and revealed its ugliness as never before exposed in the history of mankind? Evidently, by this time, your readers fully comprehend the definitions of the terms science and religion.

Spiritualism is truly a science. Mathematics is not more surely fixed as a science than is the "science of life here and hereafter," called Spiritualism.

But it is a spiritual science, differing from material science as widely as spiritual things differ from material things.

The difference between the two lies in the fact that the spiritual science is elevating and ennobling to all who dig for its true riches. To all such, all things here and now become new. To the true student of the spiritual, the future, that has hitherto been a realm of mystery and dread, stands revealed in all its wealth of possibility to the hungry soul, to be his only through honest personal effort. He learns and takes to his heart the lesson that to win the prize he must obey a law, the law of human brotherhood, requiring him to do to others as he would have others do to him.

This fundamental, immutable law obeyed, lifts up and cleanses the mortal and spirit and fits the immortal spirit for the immortal, spiritual life and home.

The true student of this science of sciences can never fail. His feet are on the true rock of the ages.

If this science is also a religion, so be it. It is worthy of all acceptation.

But the Spiritualist, so-called, who contents himself with the knowledge that old theology is a sham, and thinks himself bound by no law except the law of self-interest, will discover to his dismay that he has built only on sinking sands, only to awake to a sense of great loss and humiliation.

Spiritualism has its false prophets, who with their followers will surely land in the ditch together.

Our blessed Ism must not be ranked with the material wisdom of the world. It is as high above them as the width of the universe. One may possess a critical knowledge of a wide circle of the science of materiality, and be also a thief and murderer. This can never be true of the faithful seeker after spiritual truth.

Herein lies the secret of the unrelenting war of the creeds on this last best gift to man. Light has come into the world, but they love darkness rather than light. All robbers aim to keep well within the shadows.

IMPORTANT.

To the Spiritualists of Illinois.

The attention of all living in cities and towns outside of Chicago is asked to the fact that Bro. Geo. H. Brooks is willing to devote the entire month of April to missionary work in our own state. He plans to hold meetings on week-day nights whenever desirable, and two or three services on every Sunday. He will follow his lectures with Messages. The requirements to secure his labors will be his own entertainment, a hall or meeting-place free of expense to him, and the opportunity to take up generous collections in furtherance of his work. Much seed-sowing can be done during the first month of spring by hearty co-operation with our widely-known brother. Do not read this notice, grunt and go to sleep again. Bestir yourselves for the good of friends and neighbors. If unwilling to do anything yourself, do not stand in the way of others who would become willing workers. All corpses should be laid aside for their usefulness is ended. Forward applications to Bro. Brooks at 641 Hackett avenue, Milwaukee, or to 4203 Evans avenue Chicago. Be prompt.

Spiritualism in Jackson, Mich.

We have been having some of the bread of heaven bestowed upon us for the past few weeks, and there has been a general awakening to the grand truths of Spiritualism. We have had what the orthodox people would call a grand revival, and the speakers who took part in it deserve words of praise for their grand work. We have had Mrs. Marion Carpenter, of Detroit, Mich., who gave us two of her soul-stirring lectures. Nellie S. Baade, also of Detroit, followed by beautiful tests. We now have with us Mrs. Emma Moore, of Elwood, Ind. She has been with us for three weeks and is one of the most indefatigable workers in the field. She has not only given her time Sundays, but has devoted her time during the week evenings to circles and entertainments all for the benefit of the society. We hope to have her here for a return engagement for April. Her work as a lecturer and test medium is excellent, and as an entertainer she cannot be beat. She is a noble woman, and one that we feel no society or camp can afford to leave off its list of speakers, as her masterly lectures and accurate descriptions cannot fail to fill any lecture hall, and with her extreme generosity during week evenings, she does a great deal toward replenishing the depleted treasury of any society.

FREE Asthma Cure.

A New and Positive cure for Asthma has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Asthma. The cures wrought by it are really marvelous. Among others, Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Va., was cured of Asthma of thirty year's standing, and Mr. Alfred Lewis, the editor of the Farmer's Magazine, of Washington, D. C., testifies that after eight years' continuous suffering, especially in Hay-fever season, the Kola Plant completely cured him. He was so bad that he could not lie down, night or day, for fear of choking. After eighteen years' suffering from the worst form of Asthma, Mrs. Maggie Ross, 814 Madison Ave., Indianapolis, Ind., writes that the Kola Plant completely cured her. Rev. S. H. Eisenberg, Centre Hall, Pa.; Rev. John L. Moore, Alice, S. C.; Mr. Frank C. Nowall, of the Market National Bank, Boston, and many others, give similar testimony of their cure of Asthma, after live to twenty years' suffering, by this wonderful new remedy. If you suffer from Asthma in any form, in order to prove the power of this new botanic discovery, we will send you one Large Case by Mail entirely free. All that we request in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you absolutely nothing. Send your address to The Kola Importing Company, 1164 Broadway, New York City.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH —OR— DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Chas. A. Anderson: Q. We have been discussing the old saying that a cat has power to take the breath of a child, causing illness and death of its victim. Is this true?

A. It is one of the folk-lore tales and has a partial support in truth. The cat delights in warmth, and nestles close to its human protector, even to breathing of the breath when expelled. Sometimes it gets so close that it breathes directly from the nostrils and the child has no other air than that which is returned from the nostrils of the cat. The breathing of such deoxygenated and foul air must produce headache and many ills, and if continued severest sickness. This is quite different from the common belief that the cat "sucks the breath away," which is quite untrue.

Student: Q. Will you give the place Confucius has in history?

A. Confucius is said to have been born 551 years before Christ. Commentators have surrounded his birth with the usual fables, and cast a halo of myth over his life. Like the evangelists who traced the genealogy of Christ to David, these biographers give an unbroken line to the great Hwang-to B. C. 2637. He was a child of his father's old age by a young wife, and came in answer to her prayers to the gods, in a miraculous manner. His family suffered from poverty and he had little learning. At the age of 19 he married, and at 22 began teaching that wonderful system of blended morality, religion and political economy which has immortalized his name, and molded the destiny of untold millions of people for twenty-five centuries. For over forty years he traveled and taught his system by speech and example.

It was B. C. 478 that early in the morning he arose and went to the door of his house, and weak and overcome, murmured:

"The great mountain must crumble;
The strong beam must break;
And the wise man withers away like a plant."

Then he went to his couch from which he did not arise.

The "Five Kings" are the sacred classics of the Chinese; a portion only has been referred to Confucius as author or compiler. These books, written in a peculiar style have furnished the fundamental elements of Chinese education, and the reverence for its forms and the unyielding character of the language, has served to indurate and unalterably fix the forms of thought of those who receive them.

The cardinal principle of government which he advocated was paternalism. The people were to be governed as children, and pay strict observance to ceremonials. The ruler was the father of his people. There were especial ceremonies for every occasion, and the learning of these and their practice was made a leading part of education. As the people reverenced their rulers, children respected their parents and ancestors.

The Sacred Books mark the descendence of the age of myth into history. It is not to be supposed that Confucius was the original author of all the wise sayings and proverbs, or originator of the ceremonies. They mostly came from a preceding age. They were concrete expressions of the Chinese character and method of thought. They solidified, and made that character unchangeable. Yet, however, much as Confucius found material prepared for him, the age in which he lived was far from civilized. His people were barbarous. The densest ignorance prevailed, and when we read that at the early age of 22, having constantly suffered from poverty, we wonder where he acquired his education and what he taught. We find that his instructions consisted in moral sayings, which are among the first "wisdom" acquirements of all peoples; duties to the government and parents, and forms and ceremonies by which this devotion must be expressed. He was to China what Mohammed was to the Moslem world, Zoroaster to the Persian, Buddha in his avatars to the Hindu, and Christ to the Christian.

That he should, in an age of darkness, formulate and systematize his doctrines, absolutely shape the thoughts and determine the destiny of one-fourth the inhabitants of the earth, is marvelous beyond explanation by ordinary methods. There are many parallel examples in history, which point with unerring certainty to the interposition of the spirit world. It is what has been called the interposition of providence. By this influence he was exalted from the ignorance of his people and became an oracle of wisdom, adjusted to the demands of his race. In all the world no man has had an equal number of followers, or received greater honors. Dynasties have changed or been overthrown, yet the honors paid him remained unchanged. His descendents at this day constitute the only hereditary nobility of China, and number over eleven thousand males.

The "Analects," or "Digested Conversations," chiefly is made up of the sayings of the sage, and is not surpassed by writers of any other race or age in its practical common sense, and purity of its moral teachings. He says little of the next life, he is so earnestly absorbed in having the affairs of this rightly and justly attended to. Plain, practical morality, which brings its own reward, and if neglected, punishment follows. There is no gloomy doctrines of western theology, or unsolvable mysteries of religion. It met the demands of his people so perfectly that intellectual and spiritual growth has been impossible.

In this light Confucius was the representative of a vast congress of spirits, who through him gave to his people the religious, moral and political system which bears his name. He is one representative of the power and influence of that "providence" which wrenches the purposes of men to its own great plans, and knowingly or unknowingly bears all on its resistless tide.

Miss E. M.: Q. I have read in The Progressive Thinker, your answers to people, and concluded to ask you what would be best for me? I am nearly 15 years old.

A. You have not yet reached the turn of the road, and until you do the best thing for you to do is to prepare for the practical necessities of life. You are not old enough to fully determine on your life's work. But you can prepare for it against the time when it comes. Keep physically strong by proper exercise, and cultivate your mind by your school studies. You have a remarkable love of order; precision and neatness in the execution of whatever you undertake. Your thoughts are clear; you have self-poise, independence, and self-reliance. These qualities when your character is more fully formed will enable you to take up almost any work or profession you find offering you best inducements.

Above all things, heed the silent impressions, from the spirit who is your constant loving companion; who will hold all your efforts and your ideal to the purest, highest and the best.

"Statistic": Q. What were the number of lynchings in the United States last year?

A. According to census reports, the number of lynchings for the year 1901 was 130, and for the ten years from 1891 to 1901, it was 1765. This is a terrible fact in evidence of the civilization of this Christian country. Four-fifths of the victims are negroes, and the crime for this class is almost invariably brutal assault.

L. B. W.: Q. In "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," while it is said that the astral plane extends around each planet, it speaks of passing downward through lower spheres, sinking lower and lower. How reconcile this going down?

A. Down and up are entirely relative terms; and as used by spirit writers, have not the meaning they have to us. No point in a great zone could be down or up to any other point. We say we will go down into the slums; we will go up to the highest and most moral cultured. The lower spheres may not be lower in relative position than the higher, but the moral and intellectual attainments of their inhabitants may make them immeasurably lower.

Mrs. M. B. H. T.: Q. Whenever I consult a medium, I am told that I am a medium. How am I to know?

A. As all have some degree of mediumistic power, such answer may be true but it should be qualified. The person may be partially sensitive to control, and yet not sufficient to make the susceptibility of value. Unless there is effort made for its cultivation, it may not be recognizable. Favorably surrounded, many who have had no intimation of possessing this faculty have had it suddenly awakened, while others again, have had it slowly develop through many seances. "How are you to know?" By the test of furnishing the essential conditions for its manifestation.

BOOK REVIEW.

Dr. T. A. Bland is the author of a booklet which will prove an eye opener to a majority of doctors, as well as the people. The title is, "A History of the American Medical Union," but it is far more than its title suggests, though the history of that unique organization is of great interest, it being the first attempt, on a grand scale, to unite the physicians of all schools on the basis of fraternity, freedom and progress. It is a historical review of medical legislation done in a style to compel a reading, and force conviction that it is a true tale of selfish schemes, corruptly inaugurated and despotically executed. It is the most vivid and terrible exposure of the iniquity of modern medical legislation, and the depravity of the medico-political lobbyist who secure and profit by it, that we have yet seen. Every physician, and all who employ physicians should read it. You will find it entertaining as well as instructive. Send ten cents to Dr. T. A. Bland, 161 South Hoyne avenue, Chicago, Ill., for a copy.

THE TINKERING OF CREEDS

Denial of the Assertion that Calvinism Never Taught Infant Damnation.

The general assembly of a leading Calvinist church recently appointed a committee to revise its thumb-worn confession of faith. The undersigned was born, baptized and nurtured in the Calvinistic fold. It was in the pale of this same church, now seeking a revision, that he was dedicated to and educated for the ministry, but never ordained. The Westminster confession of faith was the theological pap from which he drew the spiritual "Milk for Babes" for more than forty years, and now that a reckless Uzzah is about to lay unholy hands upon that ark of the covenant, will you kindly grant him space to suggest a few inquiries?

The committee above referred to announces that it has begun the work of trimming by laying the axe at the root of that lusty sapling commonly known as "Infant Damnation;" and as an excuse for the radical amendment proposed, they affirm that while yielding to popular demand, the creed in question really never taught any such doctrine. That denial may find credence among latter day converts who never saw or knew anything about the creed; but the elect and chosen of fifty years ago know better. We who were compelled to study the Westminster confession and catechisms and stand a rigid examination before entering Calvin's vestibule of heaven, are compelled to deny this plea of "non est factum."

The unqualified teachings of the creed as expounded at that time was, that all unbaptized infants, whether of Christian parents or not, were irretrievably lost, and the undersigned, although not an octogenarian, has more than once heard heart-broken parents receive the comfortable assurance that there was not the slightest ground to believe that their little one was saved, because, forsooth, they had neglected to have some man ordained vicegerent of Jehovah flip a few drops of water in the child's face in the name of an impossible trinity.

The glaring absurdity of such teaching became so great that the assembly that condemned Prof. Briggs about ten years ago, sought to stifle further investigation by amending the article so that it meant that unbaptized infants can be and probably are saved through the special intercession of Jesus. But even this sop to Cerberus was not sufficient to stop the growl of discontent that comes from all enlightened quarters of the globe. And now, to meet the new demand for enlightened common sense, this committee propose still another amendment, which completely relegates the old Westminster Roundheads to obscurity and gives us an entirely new statement, viz: that all unbaptized infants dying in infancy are saved because they were "elected" to be saved.

The stigma cast upon the Almighty by Calvin and his followers was bad enough; but this is still worse; and although the undersigned has repudiated the entire creed soul-saving business, he nevertheless feels impressed to defend even Calvin's God against such vile imputations as that.

Freed from all theological subtleties, the proposed amendment means simply that in the councils of eternity past, long before human beings came into existence, God knew that Adam and Eve, whom he intended to create, would sin and entail eternal condemnation upon every descendant of theirs as long as time should continue.

When the Westminster confession was first drawn up it was the almost universal belief that infants—unborn and unbaptized alike—were under the same condemnation and subject to the same endless punishment as the Judas or Caligula of a hundred years experience. But now that same creed confession is to be amended so as to inform us that, in making that decree of universal condemnation God made certain exceptions. He foreknew that thousands of his children would die in infancy without being able to choose good and avoid evil. He also knew that some of his children would believe in Jesus, who was to be sent in the fullness of time, and would accept him as their savior. And then and there both of these classes were "elected" to be saved, and the balance of the family were "passed by" or reprobated to be eternally lost.

Now in order to quiet the prevailing spirit of dissatisfaction this committee of revision must be prepared to answer the following questions: Did the Westminster divines tell the truth when they said all unbaptized infants were lost? Or, have the divines of to-day received a new revelation on the subject?

Statistics show that human souls are passing from the seen to the unseen almost at the rate of one for each second of time and that more than one-third of them are infants under one year old. If the Westminster divines told us the truth, billions on billions of innocent little souls have gone to people the region of darkness and woe. Otherwise, if the divines of to-day are telling us the truth, all Presbyterians and other Calvinists have been blindly following blind leaders for centuries; have been spiritually feeding upon a stupendous and hideous lie; neither horn of which dilemma has the least tendency to enhance the glory of God, or better the conditions of humanity. The growing intelligence of to-day is calling for more light; more certainty concerning the life that is nothing but a continuation of the present one. The hungry children are crying for bread. Gentlemen of the revision committee, will you give them bread or a stone? Where shall they look for the truth? If you have discovered that God's chosen agents told a lie three hundred years ago, what assurance have we that you have found the truth now?

You utterly refuse to attack that Gibraltar of Calvinistic despotism, that bulwark of orthodox dogmatism, viz: Foreordination and the decrees of God. The "holier than thou" egotism of sectarianism which always causes the Pharasaical priest and Levite to show off to the windward side of the poor bruised outcast on the Jericho road, must have an arbitrary, partial deity to respect; hence the doctrine of the election of the few and the reprobation of the many, from all eternity. Millions of people are beginning to realize what these doctrines really mean, and are beginning to ask, if infinite justice, love and mercy knew from all eternity that the whole human family would plunge headlong into sin, and that only a few of them would be worth saving, and they were then and there elected to be saved and the balance sentenced to be lost, why did he create the balance, or suffer them to come into being at all?

Furthermore, when you say that unbaptized infants are saved by election, what do you mean? Saved from what? Not from sin of their own commission, for they have committed none; and not even from the sin that Adam and Eve committed, for that was a purely personal act. But the helpless, innocent little babe, whenever and wherever born, must be saved from the unending torment bequeathed as a punishment upon every human being, by a vindictive, angry parent, because of the ancestors' sin.

The most marvelous thing in our earth experience is the ease with which a self constituted priesthood can scrutinize and unfold the thoughts and plans of a God who is absolutely inscrutable and inexplicable to everybody else. And the next most wonderful thing to know, is how or why men who never owned a square foot of earth in their lives; who never aided in the material advancement of humanity, even to the extent of hoeing potatoes or building a hen coop; men who expressly declare that they have no interest whatever in material things; that although they are in this world yet are not of it, but live entirely above or beyond it, how or why such men should have absolute proprietorship of the unseen world, and let in and shut out whom they please; and apportion its principalities and kingships and joys and miseries to suit themselves, will always remain a profound mystery.

Go where you will, on street corners or village crossroads; from the gilded cathedral down to the little darkey church in the back alley, everywhere you find men and women jingling the keys of heaven and hell in your face. You find them stationed at every Jabbok ford along the Jordan of death, permitting no one to cross into the Canaan of bliss without first pronouncing the Shibboleth of some man-made creed; and each one assuring you that his or her sectarian ticket will secure you a reserve seat close to the proscenium.

But the climax of theological absurdity was reached when men undertook to lock the gate against the dear little children, and that too in spite of the command of the master—"Suffer them to come to me and forbid not;" and "unless ye become as little children" ye yourselves cannot enter. And the most hopeful sign of the times at this hour is that the ghost of doubt and uncertainty which agnostics and infidels outside of the church are responsible for raising up, instead of being exorcised, is working itself up from the pew into the pulpit and theological seminaries, until such men as Briggs, Parkhurst, Pearson, Mills, Austin and others are daring to speak the truth as their own conscience and reason presents it to them; and honest criticism within, taking the place of agnostic doubt outside, is honey-combing the entire system. The men and women inside the pale of ecclesiasticism are increasing by tens of thousands every year, who are exchanging faith for knowledge; who realize that only a thin veil separates the now from the hereafter; the life visible and mortal from the life invisible and immortal; and that in passing from the one to the other, each individual carries the heaven or hell made in this life. The one truth that is pulverizing man-made creeds to atoms is this: Whatsoever ye sow that must ye also reap. The law of Compensation is inexorable and universal; and individual responsibility for individual conduct makes the heaven or hell to or from which no one but ourselves can consign or exclude us. Therefore "work out your own salvation without fear or trembling."

WHAT DOES DEATH MEAN?

The Scientific Basis of Immortality.

What does "death" mean? If it means the absolute destruction of matter or substance, certainly man, if he die, will not live again. But is there any such thing as a destruction of matter in the sense of a retrograde of it from something to nothing? Is "death" anywhere anything more than the destruction of form? And is his body all there is of the "form" of man?

For illustration: Take a block of ice. The application of heat, in a proper degree and manner, will transform it first into water, then vapor, then dry steam. Remove the heat and it will return through these various gradations to its original form. No addition or subtraction from the substance has taken place in the process. All that has occurred is a change of form.

As the heat is to the ice, so is the energy of the universe to its substance—out of which substance all things or forms are made by change of form or substance by energy; which energy is residential in substance (speaking now of the whole of each), inseparable (having no existence apart) from it, causeless, that is, it acts without cause existing outside itself; though it may be readily granted that the substance and energy of one part may act dominantly upon the energy and substance of another part of universal substance, as in the case of the influence of fire upon ice, both substances being but different portions of the universal substance.

Now what is the substance of a human being but a substantially undivided portion of the universal substance? What is our energy but a portion of the universal energy resident in substance? Energy never creates substance, since it is only a peculiarity or quality of substance, and has no existence apart from it. All that it does is to give form to special portions of the universal substance in which it is resident, which special portions are not by mere formedness separated by vacuum from other portions of the universal substance, in fact cannot be if the doctrine or idea of lack of absolute vacuum, or (conversely stated) that substance in some form fills all space, be true. All that is ever created is form; or, we might say, all that is ever created is forms of substance. Man is one of these forms of substance.

Consciousness is the power to receive, retain, and utilize impressions. Limitedness of form and energy are among the conditions which make it possible.

We see that different portions of universal substance have different conditions, forms and degrees of energy, notwithstanding the continuousness of their substance. While the requisite of perception on the part of any form is limitedness of the form or things which it perceives, it may be, and judging from human experience is, true that the extent of perception, or consciousness (which, in passing, may be defined as perception plus retention plus the power of the form to consider such retained impressions in determining its action) of any form may depend upon the character of the various conditions of substance of which it is composed, assuming that the universal energy can and does combine two or several conditions of substance, or substance in several conditions, into one form; which supposition is not unreasonable, since we know that even man can make such combinations in the grafting of trees and the origination of new varieties.

Man apparently is to the universal substance as an eddy to a stream or an eddy or whirl beneath the surface of the ocean to the whole body of the ocean. The eddy eventually loses its form in the general substance of the stream; so man may, in time, lose his form in the general substance of the universe, and with apotheistic happiness in such a result when it is reached in the gradual unfolding process of nature. It may also be said that, even as the outer portions of the eddy disappear (as to form) in the formlessness of the stream or ocean without destroying for a time the form of the inner portions of the eddy, so it may be that the outer portions of the form called a man may gradually disappear one after another in the formlessness of the general substance of the universe, and whatever consciousness each condition held as it disappears be transferred to the conditions that remain in form. It may be, also, that each perception of the human being is registered on the innermost, most rarified, most positive condition of substance from the first, so that the disappearance of outer conditions of substance one after another no more affects the essential identity or consciousness of the form than the natural dropping of the sere first leaves of the corn affects the identity of the stalk or ear, or the "death," (partial disintegration of the form) of the outermost layer or skin affects the essential identity of the onion.

Now, if it be true that there is no vacuum in the universe, if all is substantial and substance is everywhere, then, while the physical evidence may not be conclusive, yet there seems to me to be a preponderance of such evidence as we have for the conclusions

That man is a part of the substance of the universe;

That his qualities, whatever they are, belong potentially to all the substance of the universe, since there is no other place from which he could get them;

That the universal substance does put itself (since there is nothing but itself to put itself) into various conditions, one part into one condition and another part in another condition and so on;

That creation is the wisdom, energy, substance of the universe combining different conditions of its substance and degrees of these qualities (or its qualities) into forms, and uncreation the extension, growth, or unfoldment of these forms toward the formfulness of the whole by the universal energy acting from within each form but in such a way as to cause an increasing perfection of harmony of relation between the forms in proportion to growth, or as they grow, and a gradual disappearance of the several forms as they grow into one form, all growth being in the form of the disappearance of the formfulness of one condition of substance after another, beginning with the outermost, which in man in this condition we call the body—in other words, that "creation" is simply the involution into special form of portions of universal substance by universal energy acting mainly from outside the form, and that "uncreation, or progress toward the God head," is simply the evolution (or unwinding) of the special form back into the apparent or seeming formlessness of the universal substance by energy acting mainly from within;

That man may be and probably is a combination of several conditions of substance, many perhaps;

That, since men are often hurt in their feelings when no injury is done to their body, at least not directly nor that is perceivable to the ordinary sense, such hurts tell us that the final seat of sensation is not in the body but in some finer, unseen and inner portion of ourselves, and, judging by our feelings, at the center of ourselves;

And since we can lose various portions or members of our body without thereby losing in the least any part of the retained impressions of the sensations which we have received, we may reasonably conclude that we may lose all of the body without losing conscious existence save temporarily, and that the momentary unconsciousness which is usually incidental to the "death" of the body or the severing of the vital connection between the seat of our consciousness and the body is no more indicative of the permanent destruction of consciousness than is the temporary unconsciousness which may accompany a blow on the head.

Therefore, the dissolution from our form of that condition of universal substance called by us the body does not put an end to our conscious existence; and if a man does not take on sensations for a few moments while his body is dissolving, or the connection of the rest of himself with it is dissolving, he may continue to take them on thereafter. In other words, in older phraseology, "if a man die (his body dissolve), he shall live again" (retain the power to receive, retain and utilize sensations, which constitutes consciousness).

A Welcome Burst of Sunshine.

"A second and more careful reading of 'No Beginning' confirms the favorable opinion formed from the first reading. The clearness, thoroughness, lucidity of style, reasonableness and profound wisdom of this invaluable volume hold the attention, convince the judgment and command the most unqualified admiration. I know of no man, however extensive his research or well disciplined his reason, who would not receive benefit by a careful examination of this work, while to the average thinker it must prove like a welcome burst of sunshine through a rift in obscuring clouds. A friend of mine who had just finished reading the book, emphatically remarked to me: 'I would rather be the author of that book than to be President of the United States,' and to my mind, the sentiment did credit to his judgment and character."—George W. LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that the past concerning life beyond death, continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. PUEBLO, COL.

Reorganization of the First Spiritualist Society.

By the request of our society, I will report what we have accomplished, and what we intend to accomplish, if possible, in our newly organized society.

The First Spiritualist Society which existed here some years ago had disbanded, and for some years had not paid its dues to the N. S. A.

Mrs. L. O. Larson, who came here several months ago, and who is a splendid test medium, also speaker, concluded, under existing conditions, to apply for a new charter, under the name of the old, and begin anew, the struggle for an organized society here; this by her earnest work she has succeeded in doing. Starting with seven charter members, she called a business meeting, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 16, at which the number was raised to seventeen, with good prospects for several more earnest workers; and at which the following officers were elected: H. D. Latham, president; John Larson, vice-president, also secretary and treasurer; H. D. Latham, John Larson and Mrs. M. M. Rawle, trustees.

We rent the J. O. A. M. hall, Pope Block, on Main street. We have a piano and the "material" for a good choir to lead in singing the inspiring songs that speak of the joys of life immortal and spirit return. At present we are holding regular services every Sunday evening at 8 o'clock; also a social meeting, Sunday at 2 p. m., and by the first of April—at the latest—we hope to have a mid-week service, and a lyceum also, as our audiences are rapidly growing in size and interest.

It is our hope to raise the standard of Spiritualism in this city; we know that the grand truth of life immortal can be proven to all mankind by the proper presentation of the phenomena, which is the foundation of Spiritualism; and we know that the truths taught by the higher, more progressive spirits can raise up to ever grander and nobler moral planes of life, while yet incarnate. And, true mediumship is the gateway that enables us to gain this knowledge and help from those beyond; and one of our society's ambitions is to help all sensitives we can, to develop true, noble mediumship.

We feel that one of the urgent needs of Spiritualism is for more societies, where there is held, not the superstitious feelings of the orthodox church, not the reverence produced by fear, or the worship of a personal God, but the reverence we should feel whenever we would commune with the nobler part of the spirit world. In this life we show reverence for those who have reached the higher mental and moral planes, and how much higher than they are the spirits in the higher spheres! So we are endeavoring to open an avenue through which to teach the truths they bring to us, and prove that Spiritualism stands for more than sensationalism, or a means of gaining material wealth by those who claim mediumship. We believe that there are two sides to our work, one the religious (not the narrow definition—a worship of God), the other a scientific, and, that philosophy is the connecting link between the two; beginning with science, as the generalization of known facts, or phenomena, then we see philosophy dealing with forces beyond the reach of science. Then comes religion, dealing with still higher, more subtle forces. Philosophy, the product of science, religion the product of both; and there must of necessity be a harmonious blending of the three. There can be no discord between the various facts of life; the discord between science and religion is the result of false philosophies which resulted in false religions. The accepting as truth, by philosophers, that which science proves false, has been and always will be the cause of any discord between the two.

Religion must harmonize with the known facts of science; this it can only do when based upon true philosophy, which in turn is based upon science; and the religion of Spiritualism is based upon a philosophy, as taught by the higher spirits, that can meet every demand of science; in fact it sets its corner-stone in the realm of science, upon which our philosophers have reared our philosophy, and our religion consists in the higher moral and spiritual forces brought to our view, by the two; thus we feel justified in saying that Spiritualism is destined to become the religion of the future.

It is to aid this onward march of truth we have banded together as the First Spiritualist Society of Pueblo, Colo., and we ask the kind thought of our fellow-workers, wherever they be; realizing that "thoughts are things;" and hoping your kind thoughts may help neutralize any unkind ones we may have to battle against. We would ask any true mediums intending a trip through our section, to communicate with our society, with the hope of helping one another and the cause of truth. Address all communications to John Larson, No. 125 E. Fifth street, Pueblo, Col. MRS. M. M. RAWLE.

RECESSIONAL.

Mine eyes have seen the glory
Of the spirits come and go;
And mine ears have heard the music
Of their voices sweet and low;
I've felt the dear caresses
Of their soft hands on my head
And I know I was not dreaming
And my loved ones are not dead.

Their messages have reached me
In my own secluded home
With the purest hearts about me
And while sitting quite alone;
They've written and have spoken
Of the things which they but knew
And to doubt them would be treason
To my senses good and true.

We need no pope or bishop
To declare our future state,
For our loved ones fresh from heaven,
On us wayward mortals wait;
They are walking, talking to us,
Glad to guide our feet aright—
Glad to see our souls progressing
Ever upward toward the light.

Away with monkish fable
And the God of Jewish fame,
We will trust our mothers, sisters,
And their love that will not tame;
We reject a martyred Savior
To atone for our misdeeds,
As that wrong would be much greater Than the sin that in them breeds.

I've seen them form before me
Till they looked as sound and well
As they did before they started
For the home where spirits dwell;
And have heard them rapping answers,
As my questions fast ensued,
So I know they live and love me
As before death did intrude.

I glory in their coming
And I fling the portals wide,
And I meet them and I greet them
With a cordial, loving pride;
So happy that I'm able
To shake hands across the line,
And that death may never rob me
Of the trusted friends of mine.

B. F. SLITER.

LITTLE BLUE.

One day in sorrow I sat alone, I was then without a friend,
But there was one who shared my grief, on whom I could depend,
'Twas a little speechless creature, but a friend both tried and true,
'Twas my little maltese kitty, better known as Little Blue.

Only a tiny kitty, she did the best she she could
To comfort me in my sorrow when no one else would;
While with my hand I stroked her, she looked up as if to say:
You for your kindness to me, in sympathy I'll repay.

She seemed to read my very thoughts—
what meant the tears I shed,
And while I held her on my lap, out of love I stroked her head;
My little pet, so kind at heart, does not forget me in my need,
Her sympathy I appreciate, for she is a friend indeed.

H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after three months' course: "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude, as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief. Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes that she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

John J. Bagley, vice-president of the First Spiritualist Church of Rochester, Ind., passed to the higher life at the age of 57.

Mrs. Peter Feiser passed to the higher life at the age of 23. The services were conducted by HARRY J. MOORE.

Dr. Joseph Burt Simpson was born Dec. 23, 1826. He passed to the higher life, from his son's residence in Detroit, Mich., Feb. 10, 1902. At one time he was a Methodist minister, but of late years had become an outspoken Spiritualist, and at his request I officiated at his funeral. NELLIE S. BAADE,

Allen K. Ellison passed to spirit life suddenly at his home, about 12 miles east of Meadville, Pa., Thursday, Feb. 13. The funeral ceremony was conducted by the writer, Saturday, the 15th, according to his often expressed desire.

Spiritualism was good to live by and doubly good to die by. He leaves a wife, son and daughter, who are comforted by the faith predicated on knowledge. LYMAN C. HOWE.

Passed to the higher life, Jan. 27, 1902, Mrs. Irena Barnum, at the old homestead in Braceville, Trumbull county, Ohio, at the ripe age of 92. She had been an earnest advocate of Modern Spiritualism from its earliest dawn, and was greatly beloved in the community where she lived, as was shown by the large collection of friends and neighbors that attended the burial. Funeral services conducted by O. P. Kellogg, of East Trumbull, Ohio.
MRS. O. P. K.

Mr. L. B. Howard, of Ashtabula, O., passed to the better life, Feb. 5, 1902, aged 95. The change came to him without warning. He died with heart failure. Brother Howard was a business man of sterling worth, who had held many responsible positions and was respected by all who knew him. He leaves a wife and four children to mourn his loss. Funeral services conducted by O. P. Kellogg.
MRS. O. P. K.

Passed to a higher life, from his home in Kansas City, Mo., Feb. 15, George Chandler, in the 61st year of his life. The remains were brought to Florence, Ohio, where the funeral was held in the Methodist church, Hudson Tuttle officiating, and Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle reciting a poem written for the occasion.

From early life he was a Spiritualist and made that belief an integral part of his conduct of life. In fact, it was said he was better in his business affairs, and fraternal relations than the Golden Rule commands.

There was a large gathering of his old-time friends to pay their last respects to his sad home-coming. His wife has the sympthy of a wide extended circle for her loss. She, however, is sustained by her knowledge of Spiritualism, and is cheered by the assurance that her companion will be with her even to life's end. * * *

Isaac Millisack left the material form at 7 p. m., Feb. 24, 1902. He was born at Leesville, Ohio, Jan. 5, 1831, and was married to Miss Almina Zollars, July 1, 1852. He came to Iowa in 1855 and for many years has made his home at Ottumwa where he is respected by all.

Mr. Millisack has been the honored treasurer of the Mississippi Valley Spiritualists Association for many years. His kindly face and ready aid will be missed at Mt. Pleasant Park, by not only the members but by all the regular attendants. He was a man who lived up to his highest ideals as a Spiritualist and was always outspoken and ready to push the truth to the front. Over two years ago he exacted a promise from the writer to officiate at his funeral and when dissolution approached he informed his family of his wishes which were carried out as nearly as possible. His last illness was of short duration. The funeral occurred from his late residence in Ottumwa, at 2:30 p. m., Feb. 28. We bid our friend and co-worker good speed in his work as it continues in the spirit world.

A New Treatment for Deafness and Catarrh.

Bradford McGregor, of Cincinnati, O., a well-known demonstrator of applied sciences, asserts as a fact that catarrh and deafness can be cured, this assertion following his personal experience. Having suffered for years with catarrh, which resulted in very poor health and almost total deafness, his condition became such that specialists refused longer to treat him, saying his case was hopeless. Thus thrown upon his own resources, after using all known applications, he finally devised a new method of treatment based upon a principle entirely different from anything he had ever used or heard of, and cured himself with it. His hearing is perfect now, health good and no catarrh. The success of this remarkable treatment in the many tests made upon those similarly afflicted has been phenomenal, and to further extend its usefulness and to prove that it will cure, a free trial and full explanation will be sent by Mr. McGregor to any who suffer and will address him at 130 Lincoln Inn Court, Cincinnati, O., and send twenty cents to pay the expense only for registering and mailing it.

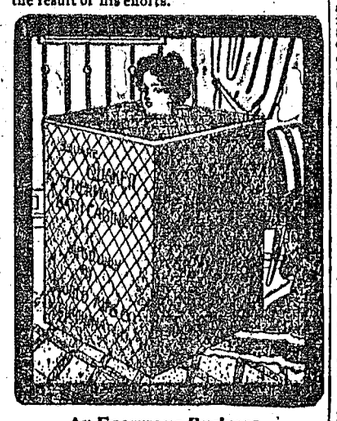
Remarkable Invention of an Ohioan that Guarantees Perfect Health, Strength and Beauty to Every User, and Cures Without Drugs, All Nervous Diseases, Rheumatism, Lagrippe, Neuralgia, Blood and Kidney Troubles, Weakness, and the Most Obstinate Diseases, by Nature's Method of Steaming the Poisons Out of the System.



Men and Women Are Getting Rich Selling Them. Read Special Offer Below. Write at Once.

It has remained for a prominent business man of Cincinnati to discover that in the application of Hot Air to the skin and its resultant perspiration lies the secret of good health, vigor, freedom from disease and beauty. He proved beyond the question of a doubt that the Romans and Greeks had but Hot Air and Vapor Baths, and that they owed their splendid health, fine physique, strength and beauty to vaporized air or "sweat baths," and so he set to work to invent a method by which the American people could secure all the marvelous benefits of the baths without expensive apparatus, bath rooms and at smallest expense.

The now famous Quaker Bath Cabinet was the result of his efforts.

An Enormous Business.

Invented and patented six years ago—the demand has been so great that over 200,000 Cabinets, were sold during the past year, and hundreds of men and women are growing rich selling them, as the makers offer splendid inducements to hustlers.

It is an air-tight inclosure, a rubber-walled room in which one comfortably rests on a chair, and with only the head outside, enjoys at home, for 3 cents each, all the marvelous, cleansing, curative and invigorating effects of the famous Turkish, Russian, Hot Air, Hot Vapor Baths, medicated or perfumed if desired, with no possibility of taking cold afterwards, or in any way weakening the system.

Clouds of Hot Air or Vapor surround the entire body, opening the millions of sweat-pores, causing profuse perspiration, drawing out of the blood and system all the impure acids, salts and effete matter which if retained, cause sickness, debility, and affliction.

Astonishing is the Immediate improvement in your health, feelings and complexion. There is not a single person living who should not possess one of these Cabinets.

Famous Physicians believe in it.

Hundreds of well-known physicians have given up their practice to sell these Cabinets, and today over 27,000 physicians use and recommend them, and every well equipped hospital and sanitarium in the World use these Cabinets with the most wonderful and beneficial effects—curing even the worst chronic cases. It beats a trip to Hot Springs.

Thousands of remarkable letters have been written the makers from users, some refering to

Rheumatism, La Grippe and Kidney Troubles

Will be interesting to those who suffer from these dread maladies. W. L. Brown, Oxford, O., writes: "My father was down in bed for months with rheumatism; this Cabinet did him more good than $50. worth of drugs. It cured my brother of sleeplessness, of which he had long suffered, and his wife of lagrippe in one night." G. M. Lafferty, Covington, Ky., writes: "Was compelled to quit business a year ago, being prostrated with rheumatism and kidney troubles, when your Cabinet came. Two weeks use cured me; have never had a twinge since." Rev. Geo. H. Hudson, of Mich., says: "I gave up my pastorate on account of nervous prostration and lung troubles; my editor so highly recommended your Cabinet, I tried it; I commenced growing better at once; am now well; nervousness gone; lungs strong; am a new man." Mr. Simon Tompkins, a retired capitalist of Columbus, O., says: "I am satisfied it saved my life. Was taken down with a hard cold which developed into a dangerous case of pneumonia. The first Bath relieved me, and I quickly recovered. It is far superior to drugs for curing lagrippe, colds, inflammation and rheumatism." Hon. A. B. Strickland, of Bloomington, writes: that the Cabinet did him more good than two years' doctoring, cured him of catarrh, gravel, kidney trouble and dropsy, with which he had long suffered.

Hundreds of Ministers

write, praising this Cabinet. Rev. Baker Smith, D. D., Fairmount, N. J., says: "Your Cabinet rids the body of aches and pains, and as "Cleanliness is next to Godliness" it merits high recommendation." Rev. J. C. Richardson, Roxbury, Mass., was greatly benefited by its use, and recommends it highly, as also does Hon. V. C. Hay, who writes: "Physicians gave me up to die, was persuaded by friends to try this Cabinet, and it cured me. Cannot praise it enough." U. S. Senator, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, Congressman John J. Lentz, John T. Brown, Editor "Christian Guide," Rev. C. W. Keith, Editor "Holiness Advocate," as well as hundreds of clergymen, bankers, governors, physicians and influential people recommend it highly.

Physicians are unanimous in claiming that colds, lagrippe, fevers, kidney troubles, Bright's disease, cancer; in fact, such has this Cabinet that no disease can gain a foothold in your body if you take these hot Thermal Baths weekly. Scientific reasons are brought out in a very instructive little book issued by the makers.

To Cure Blood and Skin Diseases

this Cabinet has marvelous power. Dr. Shepard, of Brooklyn, states that he has never failed to draw out the deadly poison of snake bites, hydrophobia, blood poison, etc., by this Vapor Bath, proving that it is the most wonderful blood purifier known. If people, instead of filling their system with more poisons by taking drugs and nostrums, would get into a Vapor Bath Cabinet and steam out these poisons, and assist Nature to act, they would have pure blood, and a skin as clear and smooth as the most fastidious could desire.

Another Important Feature is the astonishing benefit in diseases of women and children. It removes the inflammation and congestion which causes much of the pain to which women are slaves. Heat is the greatest known relief and cure for these ailments, if rightly applied. Dr. Williams, one of New York's most celebrated physicians says: "The best remedy for the prevention and cure of all troubles peculiar to the female sex is Hot Air Baths. Your Cabinet is truly a God-send to women." Thousands of children's lives have been saved, as it is invaluable for breaking up colds, fevers, croup, congestions, etc.

With the Cabinet if desired, is a

in which the face, head and neck are given the same vapor treatment as the body, producing a bright, pure, brilliant complexion, removing pimples, blackheads, skin eruptions; cures catarrh, asthma and bronchitis.

O. C. Smith, Mt. Healthy, Ohio, says: "Since using this Cabinet my catarrh, asthma and hay fever, with which I have been afflicted since childhood, has not returned. Worth $1,000 to me. Have sold hundreds of these Cabinets. Everyone was delighted. My wife finds it excellent for her ills and our children."

Whatever Will Hasten Profuse Perspiration

everyone knows is beneficial, but other methods of resorting to stimulants and poisonous drugs are dangerous to health. Nature's own method is provided by the convenient, safe and marvelous power of this Quaker Cabinet.

We find it to be a genuine Cabinet, with a real door, opening wide. When closed it is air-tight; handsomely made of best durable goods, rubber lined. A heavy steel frame supports it, making it a strong and substantial bath-room within itself. Has the latest improvements.

A splendid stove for heating is furnished with each Cabinet, also medicine and vaporizing pan, valuable recipes and formulas for medicated baths and ailments, plain directions and a 100-page "Guide Book to Health and Beauty." Cabinet folds flat in 1 in. space when not in use. Easily carried. Weighs 10 lbs.

After investigation, we can say this Quaker Cabinet, made by the Cincinnati firm, is the only practical article of its kind. Will last for years. Seems to satisfy and delight every user, and the Makers Guarantee Results.

They assert positively, and their statements are backed by thousands of letters from persons of influence, that this Cabinet will cure nervous troubles, debility, purify the blood, beautify the skin, and cure rheumatism—(they offer $50.00 reward for a case not relieved.) Cures the most obstinate cases of women's ailments, lagrippe, sleeplessness, neuralgia, malaria, headaches, gout, sciatica, eczema, scrofula, piles, dropsy, blood and skin diseases, liver and kidney troubles. Reduces obesity.

It Will Cure a Hard Cold with one bath, and for breaking up symptoms of lagrippe, fevers, pneumonia, congestion, etc., it is invaluable—really a household necessity. Gives the most

Cleansing and Refreshing Bath Known and even those enjoying the best of health should use it at least once or twice a week, for its great value lies in its marvelous power to draw out of the system impurities that cause disease, and it is truly proving a God-send to humanity.

How To Get One.

All our readers who want to enjoy perfect health, prevent disease or are afflicted, should have one of these remarkable Cabinets. Space prevents a detailed description, but it will bear out the most exacting demand for durability and curative properties.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely psychical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

CREATIONISM.

New Wonders in the Heavens---The Vortex or Nebular Theory Confirmed.

BY GEN. W. H. H. PARSONS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

STARS THAT BURST INTO SUNS FROM COSMIC VAPOR—PROF. RITCHIE'S STUDY OF NOVA IN PERSEUS — SYMMETRY FROM CHAOS—PROCESS OF WORLD-BUILDING.

"The Lord of all things dwells in the region of the heart, Arguna! and by means of his power causes all things to whirl round, mounted, as it were on a circular engine."—Chrisna in 18th chap. Bhagavd Gita. Vedic writings.

The theory of the universe, given in his Principia Philosophia, by Descartes, was that of vortices; the planets and their satellites were forever whirling round the central sun.

The impossibility of producing or destroying vortex rings, in a fluid body, has led Sir Wm. Thomas to regard the ultimate parts of matter as vortices of various kinds. Hemholtz has shown that the essential characteristic of vortex motion involves rotation of some of its parts and cannot be transferred, as smoke rings when a mortar is fired, and a smoker emits a puff of tobacco smoke.

The brilliant labors of Wm. Parsons, Earl of Rosse (born 1800, died 1867), announced the existence of spiral nebula. He applied reflecting telescopes of 3 and 6 feet diameter and 53 feet of focal length.

The observations of spectroscopists show that among the nebula their spectra have the characteristics that belong to the spectra of gases, irrespective of the resolvability or stellar nature of the nebulous mass. Others have the spectra peculiar to glowing solids.

The consideration of the evident imperceptible gradations, from the faintest and most diffuse, down to the well defined, brightest and smallest of the planetary nebulæ, led Sir Wm. Herschell to advance the theory that the fixed stars, our sun and planets, were results of the systematic operations, whereby habitable worlds were brought forth out of primitive and gaseous matter.

It is a fact of peculiar significance that the seer, Emanuel Swedenborg, in 1734, first promulgated the Nebular Hypothesis; according to which, the present state of the universe is explained, as the result of a process of gradual condensation, from a primordial chaotic gaseous matter.

Kant and Buffon, Lambert, Spencer and Herschell closely followed. But it was reserved to La Place in the earliest edition of his System du Monde and in subsequent editions, to adopt Herschell's primordial nebulous matter and its actual present existence and extended his own theory so as to include a cosmogony of the universe.

His views were adopted by Humboldt and Arago and others.

He conceived that a mass of highly heated vaporous matter occupied a space larger than the orbit of the most remote planet. In consequence of gravitating forces, it acquired rotation, by which it threw off rings of matter, which afterwards broke up into planets and their satellites.

They suggest the Descartes vortice theory, which has received the experimental attention of Hemholtz and Sir Wm. Thomas.

It is assumed by many of these scientists that primordial matter widely diffused in space, after a certain degree of condensation, combinations would take place, resulting from atomic attraction and repulsion, which acting against gravitation would produce heat; mutual attraction producing groups moving around local centres of gravity.

Many dynamic principles are involved in such motions and changes of matter.

An Arabian astronomer was the first in the 10th century to call attention to the nebula. He described the magellenic clouds and the nebulae in the constellation of Andromeda, the only one visible to the naked eye, before the discovery of the telescope.

Since that century the labors of astronomers have competed catalogue. That of Sir John Herschell, son of Wm. Herschell (both eminent astronomers) published in 1864, contains all that were accessible to the most powerful refracting telescopes; and the number there recorded is 5079. He finally concluded that there were nebulae not resolvable into stars, and that they consist of gaseous matter.

Of seventy nebula examined by Huygens, about one-third gave gaseous spectra, and the general idea of scientists is, that the nebular hypothesis solved the problem of the formation of the universe, as previously proposed by Swedenborg, Buffon and Kant, and as systematized by Herschell and La Place.

It will be observed, however, that the text of this essay points to an affirmation of the vortex as the creative power of "the Lord of all things, who while dwelling in the heart of man, causes all things to rotate, as it were on a circular engine."

In this connection touching the revelations of the Vedas and the seer Swedenborg, the view of the most profound of all astronomers is of peculiar interest.

"In the movements of the planets and their satellites," said Sir Isaac Newton, "in their direction, plane and degree of rapidity, there is to be found the stamp of intelligence—the testimony of an action, which is not blind nor fortuitous, but on the contrary, extremely skillful in mechanics and geometry.

"It is most absurd to imagine that a fatal law of necessity presides over the universe. Astronomy finds at every pace the limit of physical causes, and consequently the trace of an intelligent cause throughout the universe.

"It is certain that the movements of the planets cannot be the sole outcome or product of the action of gravitation (this was the opinion of the discoverer of the law of gravity) thus determining their revolution around the sun; it is of all necessity that a divine hand should launch them on the tangent, or right line, touching the curve of their orbits, or elliptical pathway in the heavens."

Aristotle, in the 11th book of his Metaphysics, explains the complex movements in the world, as due to a cause; and in a series of causes, a first cause, which is a pure fact—a perfect Being. Such is that Prime Mover, the first principle of all changes and realities that are produced in the universe.

"This Prime Mover," says Aristotle, "is the sovereign good; he is not only life, he is life itself, the pure act, the perfect intelligence."

What are the agencies of this creative power, from the invisible to the complex?

An atom indivisible, is a constitution of matter, wherein after repeated divisions of a solid, liquid or gas, a point will be reached when it will be no longer possible to further subdivide, being then a real unit; all matter being built up of myriads of these units or atoms, having spaces between their particles or molecules.

This is an atomic corpuscular theory embodied in the chemical atomic theory of Dalton; each particle supposed to be spherical in form, their crystalline formations resulting from the manner the atoms are grouped together.

The marvel of a chemical analysis of atoms, shows that all compound bodies contain the elements that differentiate in uniform proportions, regulated by certain laws. Thus the union of various kinds of substances, are always united in it in the same proportion by weight, having arithmetical relation to that proportion.

Thus Ampere in 1814, and Avogrado in 1811, discovered and announced the unvarying proportions of oxygen and hydrogen as 8 to 1, carbon and hydrogen in the proportion of 6 to 1, etc., all substances having uniform proportions. In all systems of atomic weight in use, the atomic weight of hydrogen is taken as unity; and the atomic weight of the other elements is then fixed. The symbol of hydrogen being H, and the atomic weight both under the old and modern system being 1. O.

Oxygen and hydrogen are invisible gases, yet when united in the proportion of eight of oxygen and one of the latter, produce water.

Thus also the primary invisibility of matter becomes finally visible to the limited power of the human eye as now in the nebulous regions of the Galaxy, or Milky Way, as also in the nebula in Orion, and Argo and Andromeda and the clusters of Berenice's Hair and Presepe.

The latest phenomena of apparent condensation took place, as seen by Prof. G. W. Ritchey, of the Yerkes Observatory, September 20, 1901, is proof of our postulate that world-building is a process, which finally becomes resolvable into a circular or elliptical gaseous vapor, with well defined outlines, and goes to show that all planetary nebula, including the material ingredients of the earth, existed (as held originally by Kant and Herschell, and finally developed by La Place) in a state of vapor, or "in some state of greater expansion," as held by Whewell.

This is the nebular hypothesis; the theory of the formation of the solar system; the result of the gradual condensation of a nebula, under the action of the mutual gravitation of its parts.

The observations of Prof. Ritchey have demonstrated, at the Yerkes Observatory, very recently, in the first year of the 20th century, the full confirmation of the Kant and La Place theory.

His photography of nebulosity proved that within a short period nebulous matter, or cosmic vapor became condensed; a nucleus was formed; which, attracting other matter, within vast, yet coterminous areas, become solidified; and thus in the process of time, become suns, planets and satellites. Thus Nova in Perseus, from nebulous, or cosmic vapor has burst into a sun and solved the riddle of the universe.

Our contention in this paper points to the still more refined hypothesis, that beyond the detection of the photographic lens of the most powerful telescope yet invented, is attenuated matter, or essences, throughout the universe, most frequently in ultimate clusters, that seem to emanate from nothing, yet are the creative source from invisibility of all worlds, and all matter whether mineral, vegetable or animal; and this stupendous process is Involution; accretion, and not evolution.

An object once in being is a subject of development, not evolution; for improvement does not imply change of species or genus, in plant or animal life.

Involution, not Evolution, is the true genesis of all life, and visible matter.

It is from the imponderable, that the ponderable, even worlds are built up; not from within outward, but from the invisible outward to the visible.

Beyond the cosmic vapor, from which new suns are being formed (as, was our own), is an invisible element in the universe, whose processes are creationism; from apparent nothing but spiritual essences; from immateriality to existing forms of all life and all worlds. That is the true and higher Spiritualism.

The contemporary mind may in rare cases be taken by storm; but posterity never. The tribunal of the present is accessible to influence; that of the future is incorrupt.—Gladstone.

WORSHIP OF GOD.

Is It Necessary to the Highest Religion and the Best Life?

By "highest religion" I mean a dominating love in the soul for justice and right—for all that is good and all that is true. By the "best life" I mean this love put into daily practice. To many of my readers it will seem audacious to ask such a question as heads this paper, and still more audacious to answer it in the negative. I am conscious of the responsibility which its denial involves. I am conscious that it is an attack on the most sacred and widespread belief of the western world. I therefore ask the reader not to condemn me till he has read this article and understands some of the reasons why I take the negative.

I wish it noticed that in what I say I do not go as far as Herbert Spencer, who says, "As man gets rid of God worship he gets better and loves justice more." This makes God worship a hindrance to man's highest good. What I wish to show is simply that true religion and a true life can exist quite as well, if not better without the worship of God as with it.

For evidence bearing on this question let us first appeal to history. Let us take the three largest religions in the world—Buddhism, Christianity and Mohammedanism. The last two make the worship of God indispensable to true religion and a true life. Their founders believed in it and required it and based their religions upon it. But Buddhism did not do this. Its founder, so far as we know, did not engage in acts of divine worship. It is reported that when one of his disciples asked him to discourse upon God, the master remained silent. Simply to serve man was Buddha's religion. Because of the omission of divine worship, it has been customary for many Christians to deny emphatically that Buddha taught religion at all, but only philosophy.

Let us now look at the history of these religions—the two which worshiped God, on the one hand, and the one which omitted such worship, on the other, and see which has done the most to develop the spiritual nature—the spirit of peace, gentleness, love, kindness, pity on earth and to build up the principle of human brotherhood in the hearts of its disciples.

They all started from humble sources by the earnest and well meant efforts of their founders, and spread until they became the three largest religions of the world. But Christianity and Mohammedanism spread largely by means of war and conquest. Their armies were the terror of the eastern world. Their flags—the cross and the crescent—carried consternation, death and destruction in their folds. Peaceful and harmless nations were overcome, pillaged and put to the sword by one or the other of these mighty forces.

They were rival powers struggling for the conquest of the world, and hatred toward each other filled their hearts. They met face to face and fought each other like tigers. The Mediterranean sea was crimson with their blood shed upon her every shore. And each side fought in the name of God. On every field of victory, amid groans and agonies of suffering and dying men they lifted their voices to heaven in thanksgiving and praise for the blood they had spilled. They were men of prayer to God. They were pious men. They were holy men. They were God-fearing men. They were fighting for the honor and glory of him who sitteth upon a throne. And they were sincere. They were honest, as they were fearless and brave. Conscience approved of their efforts, for they were engaged in planting God's revealed religion and they could not do it until the enemies of that religion were swept away.

But the savagery of a war of conquest was by no means the only or the worst infliction these powers dealt to true religion. Christianity especially went further and used all her means to inflame the hearts of her own people with hatred towards every man who dared to think for himself and express an idea not approved by the creed. Christians were taught to be intolerant and cruel, till the religious element which nature had given them was stifled.

Let us now turn to Buddhism. At the great parliament of religions, which met at Chicago, Dharmapala, a Buddhist priest, stood up to defend Buddhism. In his speech he said: "Notwithstanding the superstitions which cling to modern Buddhism and which I regret, the history of Buddhism at least does not show any such spirit of war, of hatred, of persecution, as belongs to Christianity. There is no Inquisition to stain with the blackness of hell the pages of Buddhistic history; there are no racks to torture, no dungeon and chains; no Bruno burned at the stake, or Servetus roasted alive; no Galileo imprisoned and threatened; no unjust war with its long wake of demoralizing results; no Philip of Spain or Duke of Alva to fire the human heart with inhuman hatred and revenge; no witches hung nor Quakers tied to the tail-board of a cart and whipped through the town till the naked back was gory with clotted blood; none of these Christian acts which tended to crush out every vestige of true religious emotion which might exist by nature in Christian hearts; none of the spirit of violence and of intolerance which was the characteristic feature of Christianity for 1700 years can be found connected with the spread of Buddhism.

"And yet the religion of Buddha spread till it embraced a third of the population of the earth, but it spread by its own intrinsic merit. It was forced on no one. Gentleness, tolerance, forbearance and other religious characteristics were the only means used. Where it went avarice, with its grasping spirit, intemperance with its awful misery, and war with its mad ambition to kill and conquer were kept in the background, and man's better nature, his real religious nature, was stimulated and brought to the front as the controlling forces of life."

When Dharmapala closed his address there was not a Christian speaker on the platform brave enough to question the truth of what he had said. And what he said went to prove that the worship of God does not develop in people genuine religious principles.

Let us now turn from the argument revealed by history to the argument built up by reason, and we shall reach the same conclusion. The worship of God is based on the assumption that it pleases God and he therefore requires it. But does it please God and does he require it? Grant for the sake of the argument that God is "our Father" and feels toward us as a good earthly father feels toward his children.

Is it the highest type of an earthly father who demands that his children when they come into his presence, shall bow before him and worship him? I am well aware that fathers required it of their household among the Puritans, in the early settlement of New England. Puritan children were taught to stand in holy reverence with uncovered head before the august presence of their father; but those days are past, and it is now seen that such requirement forms no part of true fatherhood.

The habit of divine worship grew into existence in Judea when God was regarded as king, and not as father. It came into Christianity from the Jews. David, their greatest and most honored king, was a man who, like other rulers of his time, delighted in being adored and praised.

When he moved among his people he wanted them and required them to bow down before him as a token of his greatness and of their inferiority. It tickled his vanity. It gratified his conceit. It made him feel his own importance. The people believed "David was a man after God's own heart." As it pleased David to be worshiped, so he demanded the worship and the people obeyed.

But Christians do not believe that David represents God. Jesus is "God in the flesh." If we would know what God is we must look at Jesus. Jesus takes the place of God before human eyes. This is the teaching of Christianity.

But Jesus never required worship. Indeed he would not allow people to worship him; he even refused to be praised, and rebuked the one who called him even good. Jesus was humble. He was meek and lowly of spirit. He was the opposite of David. If then he, instead of David, is a type of God, then God is not pleased with exhibitions of homage. If Jesus, instead of David, stands for God on earth, then God does not look with approval upon the singing of the "Psalms of David" and the ancient worship of Jehovah when addressed to him. If Jesus stands for God, then God wants no formal worship of any kind.

But suppose that Jesus is not the image of God; suppose that the true God, instead of being "Christ writ big," instead of being a person with human feelings and thoughts, with love and pity, sympathy and patience, reason, reflection, memory and all the other attributes which make up perfect manhood; suppose God is not a person. Suppose him to be impersonal. Suppose him to be the sum total of all the forces hidden in matter—the universal God of nature. Shall we then get down on our knees before the flower, the tree, the rock, and make formal worship to the known and the unknown forces which are contained therein? If we did that, in what way should we differ from those of an ancient date who worshiped the sun, moon and stars? Even if we did that, it would not strengthen our love of truth and right nor our aspiration for soul growth in life. There is another point which I wish to mention bearing on this subject. In as much as God is infinite and incomprehensible by any human mind, he who worships can not worship God as he is, but only his finite, individual conception of God. He can only worship what his mind comprehends. Whether what he comprehends and worships belongs to the true God or does not, he can never know. His imagination pictures a God of a certain type and he worships that picture. If that picture is faulty, as it must be with all finite minds, in what way does the worship of that faulty picture differ from the worship of the idolater, who is condemned because what he worships is not the "true God." As a matter of fact all worship of God is idolatrous; in one case the idols are wood and stone and stars and other material objects, in the other case they are mental pictures painted by one's own conception of what he supposes God to be.

But it may be asked, "Do I renounce all worship? If so, why has nature put reverence in the human mind as one of its chief characteristics?" I do not renounce all worship. The very fact that I possess veneration as a faculty of my mind makes it illogical, and the very fact that I feel the power of veneration almost every day of my life asserting itself within me, makes it impossible for me to renounce worship. I believe in worship. I believe it a part of religion and essential to soul growth; but not the worship of God.

What I claim is, that the highest and noblest objects which the human mind can grasp, and they alone, should be the objects of reverence, of real, inner, vital, soul worship.

These objects are truth and goodness, justice and right, and all the principles which go to nourish and build up a perfect character. These ought to become so attractive to us, so precious and so worthy of our love, so indispensable in our every thought and act, that they will become the idols of our heart and the divine objects of our true worship.

SPIRITUALISM.

Should It Be Studied as a Religion or a Science?

They enslave their children's children who compromise with sin.—Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

What is religion? In the Century Dictionary of 450,000 words subjected to repeated and careful revisions by the most eminent and scholarly men down to the year 1900, I find the definitions as follows:

"Religion: reverence toward the gods, fear of God, piety, conscientious scrupulousness, religious awe, conscientiousness, exactness; origin uncertain, being disputed by ancient writers themselves; (a) according to Cicero, relegere, go through or over again in reading, speech or thought; (b) according to Servius, Lactantius, Augustine and others and to the common modern view, religare, bind back, bind fast, etc.

"1. Recognition of and allegiance in manner of life to a superhuman power or superhuman powers, to whom allegiance or service are regarded as justly due.

"2. The healthful development and right life of the spiritual nature as contrasted with that of the mere intellectual and social powers.

"3. Any system of faith in and worship of a divine Being or beings: as the Christian religion, the religion of the Jews, Greeks, Hindus, or Mohammedans.

"4. The rites or services of religion; the practice of sacred rites and ceremonies.

"5. The state of life of a professed member of a regular monastic order: as to enter religion; her name in religion is Mary Aloysia: now especially in Roman Catholic use.

"6. A conscientious scruple; scrupulosity (obsolete or provincial).

"7. Sense of obligation; conscientious sense of duty."

The word superstition means the same, or nearly the same, being derived from the Latin word superstitio; excessive fear of the Gods, unreasonable religious belief. The exact original sense of superstitio is uncertain. It is supposed to have been a "standing over something" in amazement or awe. See Century Dictionary, edition of 1900.

Burton, in his Anatomy of Melancholy, page 500, says: "Where there is any religion, the devil will plant superstition."

Several eminent and biblical scholars have told me that the word religion (Greek, theskia) appears only three times in the Bible, as follows:

"After the most straitest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee." Acts 26:5.

"If any man among you seem to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, that man's religion is in vain.

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep himself unspotted from the world." James 1:26-27.

Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary gives eight definitions to religio—one more than in the Century Dictionary.

If the definitions of the Century Dictionary and other illustrious sources are correct, or approximately correct, all religions in their last analysis, are superstitions, and judging from our present Christian civilization the most detrimental and cruel superstitions, and the less we have the better.

Whatever the origin of the three hundred and twenty visionary religions recorded in history, some of which I have come in personal contact, and often in conflict with, in this beautiful, yet sad young world, it is very certain that they all bear the ear-marks of great ignorance, persecution, barbarism, and murder. Can we afford to associate Spiritualism with such a system? The most religious nations and individuals are the most illiterate, credulous, intolerant, cruel, and despotic. Witness Spain, and John Calvin who burnt Servetus with green wood, October 27, 1553, and said that "The best act of man's life is contemptible in the sight of God."

It is a favorite assertion with pulpit orators that religion has been the prominent factor in making the present civilization. If it was true it is little to boast of and much more to be ashamed of. But it is not true in any sense. Not a single reform for the progress and happiness of the race has ever been inaugurated by the friends of justice and freedom, that religion and its advocates did not oppose with slander and venom, and often imprisoned and killed those sustaining freedom of opinion. Religious ministers and their devotees in exalting Christian civilization greatly disparage all other civilizations, refusing to them their just meed of praise. Most of them demonstrate nothing so conclusively as their own ignorance and often their hypocrisy. I say this in no bitterness, but only what appears to me as truth and for the good and growth of Spiritualism—the philosophy and science I hold as the most useful study of this age, and which to me, is in no sense a faith nor a religion any more than electricity or astronomy is.

Prof. Charles W. Pearson, of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., is assailed in Zion's Herald, that in a late speech concerning the Bible in the light of modern knowledge he "not only eliminated everything that is supernatural but accuses every minister and Bible teacher of rank hypocrisy." What a wonderful change is that sort of logic from an eminent professor in a Methodist University, since our ancestors, the Quakers, had their ears cut off, their tongues bored with a hot iron and sometimes hung on Boston Common by the prayerful religious "saints." The most of this great change for freedom of expression has been wrought since the investigation of Spiritualism began in 1848.

What is science? "(1) knowledge; comprehension or understanding of facts or principles. (2) knowledge gained by systematic observation, experiment and reasoning; knowledge coordinated, arranged and systematized; also the prosecution of truth as thus known, both in the abstract and as a historical development." Says the Century Dictionary.

All religions that I know repudiate science. What a misnomer it is to talk of Spiritualism as "the coming religion," etc. What is Spiritualism? It is a fact, and a demonstrated one, as the sending of a message by telegraph. Communication of spirits in or out of mortal life. The Century Dictionary says:

"In philosophy, the doctrine of the existence of spirit as distinct from matter, or as the only reality; opposed to materialism. The belief that disembodied spirits can and do communicate with the living," etc.

The religious cargo so precious to our grand-parents is being dumped quite rapidly into the sea, and as intelligence advances the balance must follow. "Infant Damnation" was thrown over early in this century and "Total Depravity" has leaked out of the religious tanks. The six-day theory of the Cosmos received a death blow from the word Evolution by such magnificent men as Prof. Alfred R. Wallace, a pronounced Spiritualist, and Charles Darwin. The most humanitarian and scholarly officers of the old, bloodthirsty, religious ship are now debating in private squads what port they will sail into when the rest of the rubbish is thrown into the sea of silence and forgetfulness. Some of the most advanced and generous want Hell and the Atonement pitched overboard at once without even a prayer or a line from that old hymn—

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep."

I have been a Spiritualist thirty-five years—from actual, natural facts. To me it is not a faith, a belief, nor a religion, but knowledge. I have always deplored the tendency of many good men and women to make Spiritualism a religion; to open our meetings with prayer or invocations, and silly doleful singing of hymns, born in the superstitious and dark ages. Of course it is not to be wondered at when so many Spiritualists have been born and nurtured in the churches. I know that religion is a sad and hard disease to cure, and as deplorable as sad, but cheerful, inspiring music like Mozart's waltzes and lectures by Dean Clarke, Prof. Lockwood and F. A. Wiggin with his clear-cut logical tests, and other noble minds in our ranks, are fast obliterating the affliction that has caused so much anquish and bloodshed. Let us be done, friends, with religion and religious rites, and study Spiritualism as a natural force.

The Atmosphere of the Gods.

What chaos reigns in the atmosphere of the Gods. The old seems to be dead, and if the people knew just what kind of a God they want, from some one's subliminal consciousness the new no doubt would spring into life full fledged.

Jesus gave the world lessons of morality, but Buddha, Confucius, Hillel and others did the same. Many have yielded up their lives rather than their principles. Men and even women have been burned at the stake while defending what to them was truth. Men and women of our own time have been equal to this sacrifice had it been necessary. During our civil war there was a time when Cassius M. Clay lay ill, and a mob of his enemies surrounded the house, ready to lay vile hands upon him. In this supreme moment of their lives, the mother said in the hearing of her frightened children: "Husband, die rather than give up your principles." And I have no doubt that they both, then and there would have yielded up their lives without even asking that the cup might pass from them.

Now, why among the great army of martyrs should Jesus be singled out as the one above all others? It is plain to those who can read. The Catholic priesthood are the greatest hypnotists of any time, not even excepting the priests of India. It suited these crafty gentlemen to take up Jesus, and will that the whole world should accept him as a god. It swamped until now the whole Roman Catholic world, and in a modified form the Protestant world as well. Even gray-haired Spiritualists are being dominated by it. Forty years of my life was I dominated by this great hoodoo, but it was broken, the scales fell from my eyes, and I knew that the superstitions of the past had for these forty years tied the wings of my soul. I had been feeding on chaff while all about me the magnificent storehouses of nature were filled to overflowing with golden grain.

I am free! You are welcome to all that you can get out of the Gods of both ancient and modern times, if you will but leave me an ant-hill in the vast domain of nature. If the men and women of this country had studied nature and her laws as they have studied the myths of the past, they would not today be walking the earth with their veins full of scrofulous blood on which the filthy microbe is feeding. If they should all fast until they were mere skeletons, and in one united voice cry to the throne of grace (another myth) for relief, it would no doubt be as productive of results as was that great national prayer for the life of James A. Garfield.

The man who makes a God to lean upon knows about as much of freedom as the poor colored man of the South working with a ball and chain to his ankle in the old slavery days. If you would be happy, cut loose from all myths, gaze into the face of nature and be rewarded by a sight of something that IS.

THE REALM OF SILENCE.

All the Energies of Nature Are Spiritual.

Who can fathom the realm of silence? Who can analyze the mysterious forces that have their home in the very heart of nature? Who can explain the constituent elements of which these forces are composed, or define their essential properties? Who has ever seen an atom, or dissected its component parts? Has anyone ever seen the principle of attraction or cohesion? Is there a principle in the entire realm of nature that can be cognized by any of our physical senses? There is not an energy in existence but what is spiritual; and do not all forces either in the material or spiritual world elude human vision? Do they not all have their home in the eternal realm of silence?

The wisest and most profound thinker, the keenest philosopher, the most advanced scientist of the age, can only learn something of their operations.

We can only catch scintillations of their potentialities as they flash across the consciousness of an Edison or a Tesla. They can only reveal their existence through phenomena. All that we can ever know of principles is through phenomena that impresses itself on human consciousness. The thing itself is beyond mental cognition. There is no faculty in a human organism that can grasp the infinite realm of silence, or enter its workshop and reveal its hidden mysteries.

All generation requires darkness as a condition of growth. In the physical world procreation is only possible by a strict conformity to this condition; which is innate in nature and the only methods by which she accomplishes her regal purposes. The majestic oak inheres in the acorn, but it must be placed in harmonious relations before it can germinate. It must be warmed by sun rays and gentle showers ere it can manifest its life. The life germ in the acorn you cannot perceive, yet it suggests to the thinker something he cannot see; the primal cause is inexplicable. The phenomenon is only cause in manifestation. The cause is in the realm of silence.

We predicate many things, but assumption is not proof. Some things are axiomatic; they are, when stated self luminous, they commend themselves to our mentality as self-evident, hence require no argument to demonstrate them. "That the whole is greater than a part," "A thing cannot at the same time be and not be," is universally admitted. Levitation, or the passing of one solid substance through another solid substance, seems to contravene the law of nature, but may there not be natural laws that we have not, as yet, discovered?

We cannot tell with our present experiences and environments to what hights of knowledge we may attain in the ages yet to come. Eternity is a long time to develop human possibilities. The law of progress that dominates the race will bring to man wisdom of which in his present condition he can form no adequate conception. The divine forces in the unseen are infinite and exhaustless. They will, through the eons to come, reveal to human consciousness higher ideals, and a grander conception of the cosmos. As his spiritual powers are developed, he will come in closer touch with the soul of things and recognize more fully their oneness. Constant change and eternal growth are man's natural inheritance from mother nature. Are we desirous of securing the highest development of the psychic forces that inhere in our soul life. If so, the way is opened, and the opportunity offered: Seek and you shall find; listen to the voices of the spirit, and obey; and the result is certain.

The one living a normal life is at one with truth, justice, order and love. He is the highest embodiment and regal incarnation of the divinest in nature. His life is an ideal one, and points to the ultimate attainment of our common humanity.

May it be ours in the depth of silence to listen to the sweet voice of hope, giving us an inspiration and wooing us ever upward and onward towards the sun-lit heights of an endless existence, where the soul will reap the rich fruitage of its possibilities.

How refreshing it is to sit at the twilight hour, when all nature seems in a pensive mood, and silence reigns supreme, to withdraw our thoughts from the world of care and tumult, and listen to the inner voices as they speak to us in accents of love, and feel the impress of our loved ones who have left our hearthstone and fireside, and have passed into that realm where joy reigns supreme. The exhilaration thus experienced, no pen can describe. It must be felt at the core of our being to be realized. It is soul holding sweet communion with soul.

It is from the depth of silence that this inspiration comes; it is the divine voice that softly whispers, "peace, be still."

Would that mortals could have a realizing sense of their present opportunities, and would avail themselves of their priceless benefits. Then the millennium would dawn and the fabled Eden would be a realization in fact. The triumphant march of the race is tending in this direction.

Silence teaches a lesson of deep significance. It works its way through the labyrinths of time, heedless of what men say or do. It is ever true to itself, and demands that everything else in nature shall be true to its organic structure. This it has a right to be, and demands obedience to the voice of reason, which is the highest authority to which he can appeal.

To know the law of one's being and live in harmony with it, constitutes the largest freedom. To violate this principle, is to enslave and bring discord at the very fountain of our life. To know one's self is to know all duty and obligation. Silence is the storehouse of infinite knowledge and exhaustless wealth. May we enter its portals and become the recipients of its golden treasures.

A Series of Letters From Prof. William Denton, Through the Mediumship of Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER THREE.

It is often said by many among you, that no one can tell how it may be in the spiritual world; at the same time those very persons believe that spirits communicate with the people of earth, and many of those persons claim to be controlled by spiritual beings—in fact they give long lectures entirely, as they think, from their spirit guides. Now is it reasonable to suppose that a spirit can give a lengthy discourse, through a medium, and yet not be able to tell the people anything about the world in which he or she resides?

What would be thought of Daniel Webster, or an Ingersoll, who could discourse grandly for an hour or more, and at the same time not be able to tell an audience anything about the world, the country, town, or city in which he lived—could not even describe his own place of residence or tell by what he was surrounded—did not even know whether animals were produced on the earth or not. About all the information he could give would be that he lived somewhere, could not tell exactly where, that he was forging ahead, did not know exactly at what, but he felt a great desire to harangue the people, and so he harangued, but whether he gave the people any real information or not, mattered little providing he could string off words by the million without a single grammatical error. One error in grammar, or orthography, and he was a ruined man. Everything he had to say might be as baseless as a dream, in fact a dreamy nothingness, and when he got through no one could tell what he had said or what his aim, for really, his discourse had been a kind of aimless wandering, but it must be exceedingly learned, finished and polished. And here let me say that your orthodox divines and college professors, especially in colleges that grind out sectarian preachers, have been very learned, very grammatical, very polished, very elegant; many could, and still can hold their hearers spellbound for quite a length of time, and yet they have been preaching and teaching that which is not true, which never was true, and spiritual beings when at last they could reach the earthly world through all this dense error, these tissues of falsehood, cloaked in such polished garb, must choose, in order to give truth to the world, unlettered little children, and girls at that.

No doubt those little girls, at that time, could not write a grammatical sentence, their conversation was unlearned, unpolished; they could not probably spell any but the simplest words correctly, and yet they, and not the polished, learned divines, were chosen to give truth to the world. Jesus was a poor unlettered carpenter, who chose ignorant fishermen for his disciples; and, greatest of all the chosen seers of the present age, Andrew Jackson Davis was a simple little lad, the son of a poor, unlettered shoemaker, who could scarcely keep his family from starvation, the son being as ignorant and unlettered as the father; and, although Hudson Tuttle at the present time may be very erudite, at the time he was chosen by the spirits to give truth to the world, he was the uneducated son of a farmer, a tiller of the soil, and father nor son were neither polished nor learned.

Beware of the letter that killeth, or drives out the spirit. Great truths are usually clothed in humble attire, and when mediums are muzzled and hampered by too much education, too many rules, too much grammar, the spirit of truth is apt to grow weary and seek other and freer channels through which to give it forth to the world. And now I will give you an example that you may perceive that my words are true.

Send a young person to a training school to learn how to become a medium—vice versa—send a young person to a theological seminary that he may learn how to become a minister—teach the candidate for mediumship all about God, or Infinite Intelligence—the theological candidate the same. Both these schools, of course, can tell them all about God; then teach them this, that, and the other; some of it may be true, more likely it may be error; send them out, then, as full-fledged preachers, mediums, and so forth, and they will preach that which they have been taught—preach for a salary—and they will preach very grammatically and try to cater to the fashionable world for hire. If a spirit desires to give a great truth to the world, the educated medium shuts the door in his face, for truth, when first given, is always unpopular, and the educated medium must be popular at all hazards, and the spirit turns away dejectedly, for the letter killeth, and if he must give truth he must find some poor, unpopular, uneducated person, or child, that never dreamed of money or hire, or of pleasing the fashionable world, in order to give that often, as yet, unheard-of truth to the world.

If you educate a so-called medium in evolution straight, he will not receive and give to the world involution; he will reject it, and consequently become a blind leader of the blind. No matter how much a spirit might want to give this great truth to the world, the educated medium would shut the door in his face and he would turn away sorrowfully and seek some other way. If a spirit wanted to tell the world that animals existed after the death of the mortal body, and the medium had been educated that they did not, the spirit must go to some other unprejudiced person; and so with all and every new truth that the spirit world might desire to give. Mediums cannot be made by education. They must be as natural and spontaneous as a laughing brook or dancing sunbeam—they must be children of nature and not of art. You, as Spiritualists, a great many of you at least, are now striving to imitate the churches, to become highly polished and educated, to see who will shine the brightest, to see who can get the highest salary, to gather in great numbers and organize into cliques and sects, to gain power and great glory, to become great and powerful, to become dictators and rulers over the minds of the people, to tell them what they shall believe and what they shall not; and if a spirit succeeds in giving some truth not given by the educated medium, so-called, or one who thinks he holds the reins of power, he will trample on it, abuse it, insult it, call it unsavory names. No truth can now be given except through the educated medium, the sect, or clique. You must have educated priests, bishops, popes, presidents or kings, or those who occupy the same or similar positions. It really amounts to about the same thing.

Now in order to have all this, you must beg for money at all times and seasons, until the people are once more enslaved under the hands of the powerful, made so through their own foolish donations.

Now I ask: What has the Catholic Church done more than this? What has any sect or church done more than this? and when you get just where you want to be, the letter will have killed the spirit, and spirits will leave you entirely, for no new truth can be wedged through you. Truth will be obliged to seek—as she ever has—the little child, the poor, the illiterate, the uneducated, the unpopular; perhaps the toiling unknown writer in a garret. To these and not to you Truth will show her beaming and beautiful face, her perfect and lovely form; around these the spirits will again flock, and you, Spiritualists, or those who are striving so hard to become sectarian and powerful, will be the very ones to sneer at her, to crush her, to bully, beat, and abuse her, to say—as have the churches and sects before you, which you wish so much to pattern after—that you have the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. While you grasp her shadow or cast-off garment, she herself will escape you. Who among you, even now, is striving after new and greater truths from the spirit world? Not many. You are not asking for the bread of life, but for societies, numbers, money and power. Some of you even say now, that you know spirits do communicate, therefore it is not necessary to think much more about them or the spirit world. We will put our minds now toward gaining power, prestige, money and numbers in this world. The spirits themselves had really better withdraw. We already know more than the spirits can tell us. We are able now to dictate to them. We are becoming so powerful we can even put the spirits under our feet.

Ah! the egotism of it. But not all Spiritualists are included in this category. Some there are who set their faces toward true Spiritualism, and these seek neither power, money nor prestige, but they are seeking diligently after truth—they want to know what the spirits have to tell them direct, not what the prejudiced, educated, grammatical, so-called medium has to say, which may be truth or may not. They are willing to receive truth in the simplest garb, and they know how to extract it from an ungrammatical sentence, even from broken English spoken by foreigners. It is truth—truth they want, be it in the rough or polished, be it clothed in modest apparel or fine garments. But truth usually appears clothed very simply.

Spirits know best where and how to choose their mediums. If the better way had been to take them from the highly educated and polished classes, from these classes they would have been taken; but we have shown that educated prejudice prevented; that the letter killeth the spirit, and when the letter predominates the spirit is absent.

True spiritual teaching can be given better at home circles, through some innocent, childish member who may be a sensitive without much education or preconceived ideas; or some gentle woman, a sensitive, modest, retiring woman; or some half-grown lad who, as yet, is tied to his mother's apron strings—meaning that he is yet innocent, knowing nothing of the vices and wickedness of men—and among such have mediums ever been chosen. These may have continued to be mediums after reaching manhood or womanhood, but question them closely and you and they will find that they have been such from early childhood, and among such they ever will be chosen so far as the spiritual world is concerned. Here is where truth will show her shining face.

Now, my dear professor, I have tried to give you a brief outline of some things which I know interest you and they interested me, as they still interest me. I have not entered very largely into scientific questions in this letter, for I think what I have written herein is more needed by the world, just now, but in my next I hope to do better. You sometimes complain that spirits do not seem to get beyond a certain point, and seem to think that they ought to do better, and you ask: "Mr. Denton, cannot you give something more than others have given through me?"

Yes; I will try. If I cannot fly higher I may sink lower, or circle round a broader field. I never was, when with you in the mortal, a very great flyer, but I circled around prodigiously, and the law of my being holds me yet, I don't expect to get away from it.

Yours for Justice and Truth.

WILLIAM DENTON.

Spiritualism as a Harmonizer.

Spiritualism is the true science of life and the philosophy of right living. Religion freed from all futile abstractions, useless ceremonies and priestly domination, in the popular sense, pertains to all the vital issues of life here and hereafter. Viewed in this light then, religion, in the true modern sense can have no other foundation than Spiritualism as defined above. The different churches, as civilization advances and knowledge increases in the earth, are being compelled to modify their beliefs and practices, and are becoming more practical and liberal with the increased enlightenment of the people. In the light of Spiritualism and other modern sciences, sectarian creeds and dogmas of all kinds are becoming self-evident absurdities. Right living stands out clearly defined as the only salvation needed by the race. The formation of noble characters and spiritual evolution of humanity are becoming the end and aim of all education and discipline, including the religious instruction of the race. The truths of Spiritualism are not intended for and cannot be appropriated by a select few nor any narrow sect; they are the free, most ample and ever present heritages of all humanity.

All religious systems will become more liberalized or become obsolete; they must all conform to the demands of demonstrated truths, becoming more and more harmonized and finally blended into one universal church, based not upon beliefs and faith, but upon the knowledge, enlightenment, and unobscured vision of supreme truths already revealed and still being revealed by Spiritualism. Science and philosophy, the church and state, all human activities and Divine agencies will be blended and working as a harmonious whole, each in its own proper sphere striving for the uplifting of humanity and the eternal spiritual progression of the whole human race.

PRIDE OF SOUL.

I dreamed that I had left the molded clay
Which men have known as me—My soul had passed
Out from its earthly tenement, which lay
Encoffined where the people came to cast
Their last looks down upon it and to say
Their tender, whispered long good-byes.
I saw the folded hands, the fast shut eyes,
The brow from which the hair fell back, the face
Calm with a frankness that was new to me,
And I was glad to note the easy grace
Of all that I had left for me to see.
I watched the people come along the aisle
In grave-faced lines, some but to hurry by,
And some to stop and gaze a little while,
And now and then I heard an honest sigh.
And some of them that passed were richly clad,
And some were poor and bent, and there
Were honest friends I never knew I had,
And some, who had professed their friendship ere
That day, were seeking other friends somewhere.
While thus I gazed a fair-faced maiden stopped
And bent a little down and sobbed and when
She passed I saw where two pure tears had dropped!
And some one, halting, kindly then
Held up a little child that it might lay
A kiss upon the brow, and I was proud—
Not that I had beheld men come to pay
Respect to me—not that the busy crowd
Might e'en remember me a year or two—
But, looking on the form that lay serene
Where she had paused and where the child that knew
Nought of the sins that man may keep unseen,
I felt the thrill that those who triumph do—
That form was mine, and I had kept it clean.

FACTS AND FOLLIES

Of the World's Religious Theories.

To the Editor:—It is a well known and significant fact that in every division of the people of the earth, of whatsoever nation, tribe or race, each different locality has a specific theory, religious belief or form of worship or a different style or type, to conform to their various ideas of what constitutes sacred worship of a Supreme Being; and all worship is founded on some great, mysterious and miraculous fable or myth of the past, and descending from generation to generation through various agencies and legends, it is claimed by all the people, both civilized and uncivilized, as being a direct revelation from all overruling God, yet not one single division or class possesses the least convincing evidence or the remotest knowledge as to whether their theories, as adhered to and practiced by them, are correct or based on intellectual truths or not, but accepting them as being true, entailed upon them by their ancestors, and following in their footsteps, their rites and ceremonies have practiced them through past ages, without even giving them a second thought, or any investigation as to their validity. And so sanguine, scrupulous and tenacious are they, as to the purity of their theories, and the only correct worship, that they will adhere to them under any and all circumstances, at any cost, even at the expense of life.

It is truly amazing and astonishing to the intellectual and progressive minds, to witness to what extremes the more intelligent and enlightened portion of the human race will permit the extension of their uncompromising and ignorant superstitions.

They frame for themselves imaginary Gods to worship, having characters of bloodthirsty and merciless fiends, destroying millions of people in past ages of the earth's history, to appease their bloody wrath, favoring only a small portion of the people with a free ticket to a shining seat in a so-called heaven of eternal rest, and dooming the rest to an everlasting fiery hell. And so ignorant are they, that they are without the least knowledge as to there being such a personage in existence as a Supreme Being, a heaven or fiery hell, and yet they perform their daily and weekly rites and ceremonies in the name of the Father, and of the Son.

It has not yet appeared or been substantiated by any superior theory, or any intelligent philosophy, or by any adequate authority whatever, that there is a Supreme Being or God in existence to worship, that is the creator of the universe, and that He rules and overrules the same by the mighty power of will, or that this God has descended from his imperial throne and partook of a physical nature, and became the father of a son through the laws of procreation, and endowed him with equal power of himself, to whom all must bow with reverential awe and worship.

Consequently, there being no "Father God," I ask how in the name of common sense and reason can there be a legitimate son to hold in reverence and to worship as a son of a God?

Conclusion—No Father no Son. Yet thousands upon thousands of the people of to-day worship these formulated "Gods," and exult in their self-righteousness, believing that they are paving the way to eternal glory, and all who do not subscribe to their standard of ethics are most unceremoniously condemned to an eternal burning hell.

Now, if the Spiritualists were one-half as zealous and enthusiastic, and as true to their convictions as to the necessity of propagating the truths of their philosophy, as the Roman Catholics are, the country would be filled with speakers, and the truths of Spiritualism would flash like lightning streaks, from center to the circumference of the land, and error, superstition and false theories would be swept away as with the besom of destruction.

Now we find this condition of limited growth more or less in all classes of society, or theoretical and religious persuasions, and I notice that many that write for The Progressive Thinker are yet in a crude and undeveloped condition, using such phraseologies as "In the Beginning," "The Creation," "The Origin of Man," "The Great First Cause," and such like expressions, that are entirely valueless, because unsupportable; but as far as these writers are unfolded, these expressions are genuine truths to them. The stream can rise no higher than its source, but as it flows along so gently and so quietly in its course, it is continually receiving and absorbing little streams until it finally becomes a large, flowing and useful river. So with progressive thinkers continually unfolding, and expanding, by receiving those little rivulets of knowledge as they pass along, until in time they become brilliant and useful members of society. And as Spiritualists we are entirely indebted to the spirit world for the unloosing and the unmasking of those fetters of error, darkness and gross superstition that have hovered over the people, lo, these many years.

In taking a general and impartial view of the situation and general standing of the Spiritualists of to-day, I find that they are fast drifting into the same channels that sectarianized the Christian church of old, difference of opinion is cooling their enthusiasm and undermining their harmony; they are becoming pessimists to an alarming extent and to a positive degree, and say by their actions, in a loud tone, that if we can't rule and have things in our way and to our liking we won't work at all. This is entirely wrong, and contrary to a spirit of liberality, which should be, let the majority rule. In so doing we do not forfeit our individuality or personal self, but yield to peace and harmony.

Now Spiritualism among the masses is unpopular and its devotees have to a certain extent lost their grip and lapsed into a condition of moral apathy and inactivity, and if they as a class retrograde at the same ratio for the next fifty years to come as they have for the past twenty-five years, the cause of Spiritualism will be relegated in book form to the past and known only in the future among the historical records of past history.

But there is no doubt that all progressive followers or adherents of Spiritualism wish to see the cause re-resurrected and spring into new life and grow and prosper.

There is but one way to infuse new life and new blood into the declining body: Organization, even in small bodies, upward to a N. S. A.—not from a N. S. A. downward to small bodies—and an entire revival and revolution among the masses, that will unite, and harmonize them together as one body.

Little differences must be excluded, broader grounds and views will have to be taken, and Spiritualists will have to work together, pull together—not apart—as a unit, or soon be absorbed by the prevailing orthodox denominations.

MINNESOTA.

Fine Mass Meeting at Winona.

The State Spiritualist Association of Minnesota held its first annual mass-meeting in Winona, Feb. 28, and March 1 and 2.

Despite the inclemency of the weather, the meetings created great interest, which grew to a feeling of enthusiasm by the close of the session.

The object of these meetings was to break down the feeling of indifference that has so long prevailed in that city, and that this was successfully accomplished was evidenced by the demonstration at the close of the last two meetings.

The talent used was all connected with the association as missionaries, and the work done demonstrates the fact that Minnesota is building a wall of strength by such concentration of forces.

Those present were President J. S. Maxwell, Mrs. J. P. Whitwell, Mrs. John Sauer and Ella White, of St. Paul, Miss Alice Wickstrom, of Minneapolis, and Will J. Erwood of La Crosse.

Mrs. Whitwell and the writer, and Brother Maxwell did the bulk of the lecture work, and presented the philosophy, while Mrs. White, Miss Alice Wickstrom, Mrs. Sauer and your correspondent gave the messages and tests.

The meetings began Friday afternoon with opening remarks by Brother Maxwell, Mrs. Whitwell and the writer, and tests and greetings by Mrs. Sauer, Mrs. White and Alice Wickstrom.

Outside the storm raged as though the elements were bent on preventing the attendance of the sessions. Notwithstanding the blinding snow, etc., a few earnest souls were there to give us welcome, and were well repaid by the comforting messages from their arisen friends. The remarks were well received and the meeting closed with a feeling of fellowship that was encouraging.

Again at 7:30 p. m., we gathered for the evening session, with a better attendance and brighter outlook. After an invocation by Mrs. Whitwell, the writer was introduced and gave the address of the evening. Then came President Maxwell, with some remarks suitable to the occasion, which were well received.

Mrs. Ella White was then introduced to the assembly and entertained them with her clear psychic readings. Some singing was indulged in, after which Miss Wickstrom was called to the front and gave some very accurate psychometric readings, which made friends of those who received them.

The hour was late, but still the friends were hungry for more, and Will J. Erwood was called upon and gave a number of readings and messages from those who had grown tired of the physical, but who still remembered the old friends of earth.

Saturday afternoon, a good meeting in the cozy front hall, in which comfort was given to many, showed that the ice of indifference was melting, and that Spiritualism was not dead in Winona.

Mrs. Whitwell gave the address of the afternoon. Many favorable comments were heard, the writer hearing some say that it was one of the most elevating lectures they had ever heard. It certainly was an able effort on the right lines. Mrs. Sauer, Mrs. White and Miss Wickstrom again gave messages, and succeeded in making more friends.

At 7:30 an increased attendance, and more barriers removed. Your correspondent again gave the address of the evening, which was closely listened to by those present.

All of the mediums present joined in carrying the good news, and proving that the "dead are not dead, but are living yet."

Sunday morning, Mrs. Whitwell and Mrs. Sauer left us and went to La Crosse to fill the place made vacant by the absence of the writer, and we were left to finish the work laid out for us, without their able assistance.

The morning session gave evidence of what the day's work would be, and was an enjoyable meeting, the inspiration being strong and conditions fine.

At 2:30 p. m., a splendid audience gathered, and we began our work in earnest.

An invocation by Miss Wickstrom, and then the address of the afternoon, by Will J. Erwood, followed by remarks by J. S. Maxwell, and instrumental music by the able pianist who had charge of the music throughout the meeting, and the conditions were favorable for Mrs. White to begin her work, which she did.

The work done at this session by Mrs. White was very satisfactory and convincing. Then the writer was called again to give messages, as also was Miss Wickstrom, and the session was adjourned until evening.

At 7:30 p. m. the banner audience of the entire session assembled, and the eagerness to receive something from from the other side of life was plainly shown by all present. Skepticism had been overcome by the previous meetings, and each one was ready for the best meeting of the series.

An invocation opened the program. Music and then an address upon "Thought, Mind and Its Kindred Forces," by the writer, was well received. Mrs. Ella White followed with tests and gave many of the most satisfactory kind. Then Brother Maxwell spoke for a few moments, and touched upon important issues in connection with our philosophy and its successful maintenance.

The forces were with us and all were at their best. Will J. Erwood responded to the call, and gave a number of tests to eager seekers for truth. More music, and Miss Wickstrom came forward, eager to work. Her readings were well received, and were all recognized; so enthusiastic had the audience become that when Miss Wickstrom sought to retire, the audience applauded wildly and she had to get up and give them more tests.

The meeting closed, and still the audience gave no evidence of a desire to leave, but almost to an individual made a rush to the platform, and besieged President Maxwell and the workers to return and give them some more. This we promised to do, and arrangements are being made to go back in April.

The musical part of the program was under the direction of Miss Matson, of Winona, and was a great help to all.

Monday we went in a body to La Crosse and held a rousing meeting Monday night in the little Temple occupied by the local society, of which the writer is at present the permanent speaker. Good work was done here, and an invitation extended to the visitors to come again.

THE SYMPOSIUM.

It Will Result in Great Good.

The great symposium in the ever instructive Progressive Thinker on the question of Spiritualism being a religion or science, or both, will naturally arouse much thought and careful study as regards what Spiritualism in its completeness really is.

But I am thinking it has been, and will be to each individual just about all that he or she, according to their development, is capable of appreciating. And may the many thoughtful readers of this symposium be so free from the vitiating influences of old superstitions as to be able to come to a true understanding of Spiritualism in its unadulterated purity.

My dear Scotch Presbyterian mother taught me that to have religion I must first realize my sinfulness, my natural depravity; then repent of my sins and with an humble, contrite heart ask God's forgiveness through the blood of Jesus Christ. Through this I would have a change of heart, my sins would be washed away, and then I would worship God in the beauty of holiness; would have religion.

And this would be religion in accordance with the definitions given by our standard lexicographers. But a more comprehensive definition than this will be placed in our lexicons sometime. And then restrictive and persecutive decisions will not be so easily made against Spiritualists and Liberalists as is now sometimes the case.

And let me say to you, my Spiritualist and Liberalist friends, if you are wise, and want to hasten this improved condition of affairs, you will bear well in mind this point whenever you go to the ballot-box to deposit your vote.

But what matters it? Call it a religion or not, we have our Spiritualism all the same, and it is here to stay. May we study well this symposium and become better able than ever before to eradicate those preconceived notions, those old superstitions that cast their dark shadows into our minds. Then we will be the more able to retire into the silence of our inner selves to receive the thoughts of wisdom from the higher realms; messages from our loved ones gone before, and a soul growth that will be an inestimable blessing, not to self alone but, to the great world of humanity.

The word religion has an agreeable, even a charming sound to many, and they may be able to tell why it is so. But I am not especially partial to it, although it might possibly seem well enough to make use of it under certain circumstances. But I make use of my Spiritualism every day, and I think others do the same to the best of their ability, even though they do call it a religion. No one of us can arise much above his natural level.

I have no objection to the blending of Spiritualism with science, if it can be done. "Science" and "scientific" are great words. They are apt to indicate great learning. So great that it is about impossible for us common folks to quite understand what some scientific people mean by what they say when expressing themselves from their scientific standpoint.

Seven weeks in our home circles in the early days of Spiritualism gave us incontestable proofs of spirit return. Seven years of scientific investigation, by great scientists, still leaves the subject of spirit return, in their opinion, in great doubt! And still this scientific investigation is going on. Let us not be discouraged.

Hanging for Murder.

If one man kills another does that confer the right to kill the murderer? While the old rule of the sacred scriptures assert retaliation and revenge, the later rule which forbids it is the better way. To take life for life is barbarous. To kill a wicked man is a poor use to put him to. It does him no good, nor does it help or restore the dead victim. However, while the death penalty bears rule, it should be made as little offensive as possible.

Hanging can be improved upon. The law should be amended and made less offensive. Let him step out as quietly "as if he were to wrap the drapery of his couch about him and lie down to pleasant dreams."

Observe an incident. In a brewery or winery, was a large tub or tank that had been standing for some time idle or empty. A laborer put down a ladder and himself descended to the depths below. After going a few steps he fell unconscious and dead. Another man followed; he fell in like manner. A third man concluded to take with him a lighted candle. As he descended over half way, his candle flame went out.

This incident admonished him of the presence of the deadly carbonic acid gas, a poison quickly fatal to all breathing creatures.

Now with this serene object lesson before us, why not profit by the knowledge it conveys? Let the condemned be seated, or he may lie down, while a crucible of burning charcoal is filling the limited inclosure with the fatal gas. Speedily the victim falls unconscious and is dead. Can there be any objection to this serenely insidious personal exit? I can see none. Then why not at once adopt it as a quiet, high grade mode of execution.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

WONDERS NEVER CEASE

In the Occult World, at Carroll, Ind.

Flora, Ind.—Ghosts are cutting up queer pranks at the village of Carroll, ten miles from here. There is a house at that place that is haunted, and the antics of the spectral visitant have furnished material for more thrills in the little village than are contained in all the odd narratives that the gifted Poe produced. So many people have seen and felt the wonders of this haunted house that doubts have ceased, and even those the most incredulous about things supernatural have been converted to a belief in their reality.

In its appearances there is nothing about this house to indicate that it is not as other houses are. It is a modest-looking, two-story frame structure, with a distinct air of domesticity about it. Yet its very tranquillity has become a source of terror to the community, which shuns it by day as something deadly, while at night the boldest spirit in the village cannot be hired to pass it alone.

The house is owned by one of the residents of the village, Frank Yater. It is not Mr. Yater's fault that he owns it, however. He can't sell it, even at half the price that it cost. He can't give it away either. He can't rent it, and he can't get any one to take it rent free and live in it. The house is a "dead one" on Mr. Yater's hands, and the individual who can exorcise the malign influence that permeates it is assured of a liberal reward from its harassed owner. He has had dozens of tenants, but none that would stick. A few days of residence and they were out again and looking for other quarters.

Six months ago Mr. Yater announced that any one who would move into the house could have it rent free for a year. This was a temptation and it appealed to a number who thought the stories about the house might be untrue. In three months following Mr. Yater's announcement the house had had seven different tenants. With their families the following men took possession: Edgar Munroe, Oliver Phillips, Dallas Crumes, Robert Coapstick, John Tidrick, Albert Lape, and George Meeds. Most of these tenants retained possession only a few days and then moved out. Albert Lape stayed in possession nineteen days, the longest of any of the lot. George Meeds moved into the building February 7. He moved out bright and early Monday morning, February 10. His experience in the house was such that he has felt constrained to shake the dust of Carroll from his feet and take up his abode in Flora. He says he never wants to set his foot in Carroll again.

In some respects the stories of all the tenants tally. Footsteps are heard at all hours of the day or night, doors open and close without any visible agency, the crashing sound of dishes comes from the dining-room when there is no one in it, groans of the most agonizing character are heard, while many have actually seen the spectral visitant, a being so terrifying in appearance that the spectators do not even like to tell of it.

Mr. Lape, who has to his credit the longest tenancy of the haunted house, tells some marvelous stories of his experiences. The house had been untenanted for some time when Mr. Lape took it, and the night before his family was to arrive he took possession and decided to spend the night there. He had a bed, table, chair, and lamp moved into one of the rooms on the lower floor, and built himself a fire in the grate. Having an utter disbelief in the supernatural, he felt no fears as to any probable visitors, and was, in fact, rather in hopes that some would appear so that he might expose what he was confident was merely the mischievous pranks of some of the neighbors. Mr. Lape had a fox terrier, an animal with the most intense curiosity, and a disposition to nose around in corners and out of the way places, and this he took along with him.

On arriving at the house Mr. Lape's attention was directed to the peculiar actions of the dog. As a general thing, the animal was disposed to roam ahead of his master, and when the door of the house was opened he darted in. He immediately darted out again, and betrayed a manifest disposition to run away. He came back at Mr. Lape's command, however, but kept close to the latter's heels, all the while showing the greatest uneasiness.

Mr. Lape's first action on entering the house and fastening the door was to make a tour of the building. He examined all the windows, and saw that they were securely fastened. Upstairs there are four rooms, and the doors of all these he closed and locked. Then he returned down stairs and locked all the doors on that floor, including one that led from the room in which he was to pass the night into an adjoining room. All the time the dog kept at his heels, and kept staring intensely at something that seemed to be moving about.

Having completed his preparations, Mr. Lape sat down near the table containing the lamp, and began to read the paper. The dog had taken a position on the floor in front of the grate fire, but his head still kept moving about, as if following the actions of some person, and his eyes were set. Mr. Lape talked to him, but he seemed to pay no attention to his master, and so the latter resumed the consideration of his paper.

It was nearly 12 o'clock when Mr. Lape distinctly heard the sound of footsteps in the adjoining room. He arose softly and moved toward the door of communication, which he had locked, and the key of which he held in his hand. His intention was to suddenly throw open the door, and catch the mortal visitant that he was sure was there. As he reached the door, however, he was amazed to see it noiselessly open, in spite of the fact that it had been locked. Mr. Lape was not daunted by this fact, and boldly walked into the room, the dog all the time at his heels. The sound of the footfalls still continued, yet by the light of the lamp which Mr. Lape carried in his hand he could see that the room was vacant.

At one of the farther corners of this room was a door that opened into the hall and toward this Mr. Lape moved. As he did so, the footsteps seemed to move directly in front of him, and on looking down on the floor, which was thickly coated with dust, Mr. Lape was amazed to see the imprint of a naked human foot made before him as the footsteps moved. Arriving at the further door it swung open as noiselessly as the other had done, although it had been locked by Mr. Lape. The footsteps moved steadily and audibly along the hall, leaving their trail of impressions in the dust and went up the stairs. Mr. Lape followed in time to see the door of one of the bedrooms open noiselessly and then close again. The trail of footprints led to this door, yet when Mr. Lape reached it it was locked securely. He opened it with the key which he had with him, but the room was empty. There was no other door by which it could be entered, and the only other egress from it was by the window, which was securely fastened.

When Mr. Lape turned to go out of the room he found the door closed. He heard no sound of closing, and had left the key in the lock on the other side when he opened it. He set his lamp down and tried to force the door open, but couldn't budge it. When thoroughly exhausted with efforts to get out of the trap in which he had been captured Mr. Lape paused with the intention of getting out of the window. As he picked up the lamp from the floor he was surprised to see the door slowly and quietly open, and then he walked down stairs. There he found all the doors closed and locked, although he had left them open when he went upstairs.

Most men would have had enough by this time, but Mr. Lape had his "dander up," as he expresses it, and was resolved to see the show out. He again placed the lamp on the table and sat down by it to read one of the papers he had brought along. His reading was soon interrupted by a sensation of intense cold, and at the same time the light from the lamp began to grow dimmer and dimmer. Not only the lamp, but the fire in the grate began to grow dim, while in the air before him what appeared like a cloud, with the outlines of a human form, was visible.

Mr. Lape's attention was now attracted to the dog, which had forsaken his position in front of the fire and had sneaked off to the farthest corner of the room. There he stood with his back to the wall, every muscle strained as if about to leap on something, his hair erect and his teeth bared, while the froth dropped from his lips. Mr. Lape called to him, but the animal paid no attention. Then Mr. Lape's attention was called from the dog to the cloud-like shape that was before him, and to which he attributed the intensely cold feeling that affected him. From this cloudy shape could be plainly seen two eyes—eyes that were the essence of malignity and devilish hate. The light had grown so dim that the room was by this time almost in darkness. Once or twice Mr. Lape said that he felt an icy clutch at his throat, but this he brushed away. "If I had betrayed the least fear," he said, "I am certain I would now have been a dead man."

This horrible appearance was in the room, as near as Mr. Lape can reckon, about fifteen minutes. Then the cloudy shape disappeared and the figure of a young and beautiful woman was seen sitting at the table where Mr. Lape had sat. She appeared to be in the deepest distress and groaned and wrung her hands in agony. The woman sat thus for several minutes and then, rising, moved toward the door leading into the hall and vanished.

Immediately the lamp, which had been burning so dimly, blazed up to its natural flame, and the fire in the grate became bright again. Mr. Lape then looked toward the corner where the dog had stood and saw the animal lying down as if sleeping. The dog did not answer to his call, and when he walked over to it and stooped down to pat it he found that the poor animal was dead. That was all that Mr. Lape could stand for one night, and he made up his mind to leave the house. As he went out into the hall the footsteps again sounded before him, and he saw the marks in the dust made by the invisible walker. He also thinks he heard a mocking laugh as he opened the door, but he is sensible that his nerves were more or less upset by this time, and therefore will not be certain that his senses may not have deceived him.

Dallas Crume, another of the tenants, is a nervy and original young man who recently married and started housekeeping in the haunted house. One bright afternoon he heard a noise in the parlor, and on turning he was positive he saw the dim head and shoulders of a woman dodge behind an open door. He kept his eye on the door until he secured his camera. Then he seated himself in a rocking chair in the room with the supposed ghost, ready to take a snapshot should the apparition again appear. Mr. Crume said it did appear—came from behind the door and quickly glided behind the dresser just as he pressed the button. His surprise was intense when the photographer developed the plate and showed him a photo of himself seated in the parlor, holding a camera, just as he did on that day.

"Whether the house is haunted or not," said William Sheets, one of the most prominent men in Carroll, "it has a right to be, if the theory is true that restless spirits of murdered innocence return to earth to guard the spot on which the last drop of their blood was spilled." And he told the story of a suspicious circumstance that happened years ago.

In 1874 the big Burlington ditch was constructed. Over fifty men were engaged in the work of excavation, and they were mostly Italians. Among their number was a young Italian named Giovanni Swarci, and his wife. The latter was remarkably beautiful and was idolized by the Italians. A reckless Ohio youth, who was popular with the Americans on the job, fell desperately in love with Giovanni's wife and developed a generous hatred for every other member of the Italian band. One pay night the usual drunken debauch was indulged in, and the Ohio boy was noticeably troublesome. About midnight screams were heard at the home of Swarci, and then all was silent as the tomb.

The next morning Giovanni Swarci, his wife, or the Ohio youth could not be found. No one seemed to know anything about them, and no one cared particularly. Rumors soon started that the house in which Swarci had lived was haunted.—Inter Ocean.

TELEPATHY.

Lucid Explanations in Regard to It.

The theory of telepathy, or thought transference, is at last receiving the support of science, Sir William Crookes and Dr. Oliver Lodge, two of Europe's most distinguished scientific men, being the latest authorities to declare an unqualified belief in its correctness.

Dr. Lodge is, indeed, so thorough a convert, that he read an elaborate paper the other day at a meeting of the Psychic Research Society in London in defense of the hypothesis.

One of the best authorities in the United States on telepathy and kindred subjects is Dr. R. Osgood Mason, of No. 348 West Fifty-eighth street, New York.

Dr. Mason is a member of the Academy of Medicine and has devoted his attention for more than thirty years to psychic investigations.

His best known productions in this line are "Telepathy and the Subliminal Self" and "Hypnotism and Suggestion in Therapeutics, Education and Reform."

Dr. Mason was asked to explain the position recently taken by Dr. Lodge, Sir William Crookes and other scientists on the subject of telepathic communication. He said:

"Until recently it has been extremely difficult to convince scientific men that there was really anything in thought reading. Since Prof. W. F. Barrett, Fellow of the Royal Society of Great Britain, entered the field of psychic research, however, and began investigations on a scientific basis, there has been less chance for the skeptic to cast reflections on this field of work.

"Other men high in the world of science have since taken up the subject. Prof. Henry Sidgwick, Trinity College; Prof. Balfour Stewart, Owen's College, and others indorse telepathy and have made independent researches.

"Telepathy, or thought transference, is the name applied to the influence which the mind exerts on another apart from any communication through ordinary channels.

"The achievements of men like Bishop in what is popularly called 'mind reading' have been explained by Dr. William B. Carpenter, the eminent English physiologist, as 'unconscious muscular action' on the part of the person doing the willing and 'unconscious cerebration' on the part of the sensitive or person being willed.

"This might explain some classes of telepathy—where contact existed between the subject and the operator—but where no contact occurs the 'muscular unconscious action' will not account for the wonderful phenomena.

"Telepathy is of four kinds:

"1. Where a person does some act when touched by another—this act being previously 'willed' by the latter.

"2. Where one does something 'willed' by another and there is no contact.

"3. Where a name, number or card is guessed or 'seen' mentally, or a drawing is made without any communication between one person and another.

"4. Where the same ideas have occurred to or the same impressions have been conveyed from one person to another when both were separated by long distances.

"One of the most remarkable phases of telepathy is that in which one person is able to draw pictures from mental images made in another's brain.

"Thousands of cases of this kind have been authenticated and published in the journal of the Psychic Research Society.

"This is the way telepathic drawing is done:

"A person sits at a table blindfolded and with his back turned toward another person. The person at the table has no contact with the other operator.

"A third person now makes a drawing and holds it up to the eyes of the person not seated at the table. The person seated at the table is able, before the lapse of a certain period of time, varying from a minute to five or six minutes, to reproduce a drawing which, as a rule, bears a striking resemblance to the image in the mind of the second number of the experimental group.

"In some cases of drawing telepathy the blindfolded person is able to give an exact reproduction of the operator's mind; in others the outline bears only a slight resemblance.

"There are hundreds of these kind of telepathic cases recorded by the Society of Psychical Research, and many of these drawings have been published.

"Telepathy is sometimes very strongly brought into play by persons at long distances. One of the most notable cases was that which occurred to Samuel M. Clemens (Mark Twain). He had thought of a certain story and had made an outline sketch of it, placing it away in a drawer. At the same time he thought of writing to some one far distant and telling him about the story. He did not send this letter, however.

"A few days afterward he received a letter from the very person to whom he intended writing, and in this letter was a sketch, almost word for word, of the story Mr. Clemens had thought of writing.

"How often does it occur that you are thinking of a certain person and, chancing to look up, you behold the object of your thoughts very near you? Again, how frequently it happens that persons in distant parts of the world will begin writing letters to each other at the same moments of time.

"All these things are telepathy, and the phenomena cannot be wholly overlooked even by the most scientific.

"The basis on which telepathy is founded is very solid.

"Thought transference has the same claim to acceptance that many physical facts had in the early days of experimental science.

"The reality of telepathy cannot be doubted, though we may not be able to explain its exact manner of operation."—Pittsburg Leader.

CLOUDS ARE ONLY FOR A DAY.

I sit at my window and sigh,
As I gaze at the cheerless beyond;
For everywhere, both far and nigh,
All nature seems to despond.
The dripping rain falls slowly down,
From leaden skies o'erhead—
Chill Winter's wind is moaning round
The graves of flowers long dead.

Yet gloom and storm will pass away,
And brightness come as ever;
The clouds are only for a day,
But sunshine is forever.

So o'er my life, which promised fair
Full many a joy to gain,
Hath swept the grievous clouds of care,
And poured upon me Sorrow's rain.
Yet still I would not long repine,
And no'er forget the good I've had;
Though bitterness is sometimes mine,
My heart shall yet be glad.

For gloom and storm will pass away,
And brightness come as ever;
The clouds are only for a day,
But sunshine is forever.

SPIRITUALISM.

Extent of the Belief in the Same.

It is somewhat surprising to learn that Spiritualism has a million adherents in the United States and Canada. Such, however, is the estimate of Mr. Frederick W. Weller, A. M., who states further that fully a quarter of this number are members of Spiritualistic organizations. Writing in the Metropolitan Magazine (New York, January,) he says:

"There are 650 local societies of Spiritualists in the United States and in the neighboring Dominion. They represent every phase of human desire for communion with the released souls of loved and honored ones, from that which seeks satisfaction in physical manifestations of the departed spirit's presence to that which, rising to a religio-philosophic plane, finds its life in psychic intercourse or soul-communion; accepting all the truly spiritual teachings of the churches, but adding thereto the new revelation, or, to put it more correctly, the new perception of those relations between all spirits, which, these believers hold, are revealed in the Bible. Of the 650 societies in existence, nearly 300 are circles of believers and investigators, drawn together and held by the personality of mediums whose physical manifestations inspire faith or create wonder. The other societies are representative of the philosophic and religious aspects of Spiritualism, many of them being legally incorporated bodies, and not a few of them holding their articles of incorporation in the character of religious organizations and even as churches. They have their regularly ordained and installed pastors or ministers, and maintain Sunday services of worship, which in most respects are precisely similar to those marking the day in churches of a non-ritualistic character, Sunday-Schools, or lyceums, for the religious instruction of the young, are a frequent feature in the life of these organizations."

One of the most effective agencies in the propagation of Spiritualistic ideas is the camp-meeting. At the present time, we are told, there are no less than fifty-five Spiritualistic camp-meeting associations, some of them owning extensive and well-located property. The most noteworthy of these camps is that known as Lily Dale, near the village of Fredonia, N. Y. Mr. Weller continues:

"The workers in the cause of Spiritualism are many and their gifts are various. About 350 lecturers, pastors and platform mediums are engaged in presenting the Spiritualistic thought to the public. They are as a rule inspirational speakers and psychics, or mediums. In addition to these there are not less than 1,500 psychics engaged in presenting publicly the various phases of spirit manifestation, while it is estimated that there are some 10,000 mediums who exercise their gifts in private. Home seances and private circles are strong factors in extending and strengthening the hold which this cult has taken upon the minds of the people. In many places the largest and most desirable halls are regularly hired for meeting-places, while there are about eighty-five churches, temples, auditoriums, and other buildings in the United States dedicated to Spiritualism.

"Only a portion of the Spiritualists make a religion of their belief, using it as a means of soul-development, and led by it toward an altruistic relationship with all souls, those embodied in mortals and those which have passed beyond the veil of mortality. For it must be stated right here that there exists a phase of the Spiritualistic thought which contemplates the possibility of mortals assisting the immortals in their development, as well as the possibility of receiving aid in the spiritual progress which may be made by those still in the flesh."

The Spiritualists do not agree in any formulated creed, but they hold to the soul's immortality, and communication between spirits who have departed from the flesh and mortals still in the body. The immanence of God in the universe is recognized in one form or another. The Spiritualists regard the Bible as the product of inspiration, divine in so far as the divine is continually manifesting itself in that light which comes from the higher life into this through the communion of souls. Jesus, looked upon by Spiritualists as the great psychic of his time, is accepted as a living example and model of sonship to the Deity, and as a teacher whose words of wisdom are saving, in that they lead to the most perfect development of that sonship in us. Mr. Weller goes on to say:

"The National Spiritualists' Association stands for the idea that modern Spiritualism is the recognition of universal principles operative in nature; and that spirit return and communication afford the avenue through which immortality is demonstrated. The association adopted a declaration of principles at the annual convention held in Chicago in October, 1899. It declared six propositions. First, we believe in Infinite Intelligence. Second, we believe that the phenomena of nature, physical and spiritual, are the expression of Infinite Intelligence. Third, we affirm that a correct understanding of such expression, and living in accordance therewith, constitutes the true religion. Fourth, we affirm that the existence and personal identity of the individual continue after the change of death. Fifth, we affirm that communication with the so-called dead is a fact scientifically proven by the phenomena of Spiritualism. Sixth, we believe that the highest morality is contained in the Golden Rule: 'Whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye also unto them.'

"Spiritualism teaches that the event called death is not disastrous, nor a penalty for sin, but an event as natural as birth and presenting unlimited possibilities.

"On the practical questions of life that association takes what is commonly regarded as advanced ground in some respects, as in declaring that intoxicating liquors, opiates, tobacco, and unnecessary stimulants should be avoided; in opposing war as unnecessary, and urging the settlement of international disputes by arbitration; and in favoring the abolition of the death penalty for the reason that capital punishment is a relic of barbarism, wholly inimical to modern ideas concerning crime causes and their cure."

Whatever may be the actual truth or error of Spiritualism, concludes the writer, it is a belief that is full of comfort to those who accept it honestly and implicitly. It is a religion which, if properly understood, is an inspiration to better living; and in that respect it is entitled to the fairest consideration of even those who find themselves unable to accept what its advocates claim to be truths."—Literary Digest.

Why not start a business for yourself, reap all the profits and get a standing in your locality.

If you are in some one's employ, remember he will not continue to pay you a salary only so long as he can make profit out of your labor.

In this era every bright man and woman is looking to own a business, to employ help, and to make money.

It is just as easy to make money for yourself as it is to coin money for some grasping employer, who pays you a small salary each week.

If you are making less than $30 weekly it will pay you to read this announcement, for it will not appear again in this paper.

If you read it and take advantage of the opportunity offered, you will never regret it. To own a business yourself is certainly your ambition.

We start you in a profitable business. Teach you absolutely free how to conduct it.

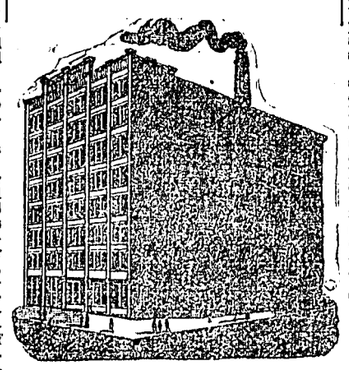
$20 to $35 weekly can be made at home or traveling, taking orders, using, selling and appointing agents for PROFESSOR GRAY'S Latest improved, Guaranteed Plating Machines and Outfits. NO FAKE OR TOYS, but genuine, practical, complete, scientific outfits for doing the finest of plating on WATCHES, JEWELRY, KNIVES, FORKS, SPOONS, CASTORS, TABLEWARE OF ALL KINDS, BICYCLES, SEWING MACHINES, SWORDS, REVOLVERS, HARNESS AND BUGGY TRIMMINGS, metal specialties; in fact all kinds of metal goods. HEAVY THICK PLATE. GUARANTEED TO WEAR FOR YEARS. No experience necessary.

There is really a wonderful demand for re-plating. You can do business at nearly every house, store, office or factory. Almost every family has from $2 to $10 worth of tableware to be plated, besides watches, jewelry, bicycles, etc.

Every boarding house, hotel, restaurant, college or public institution has from $5 to $75 worth of work to be plated. Every jewelry, repair or bicycle shop, every dentist, doctor and surgeon, every man, woman and child you meet has either a watch, some jewelry, bicycles, instruments, or some articles needing plating.

Besides the above there are hundreds of patentees and manufacturers of metal goods, bicycles, sewing machines and typewriter repair shops who want their goods plated, or to whom you can sell a plating outfit, furnishing them supplies for doing their own plating.

Retail Stores which handle hardware, harness, tableware and plated or metal goods all need a plating and polishing outfit for refinishing goods that become worn, soiled, rusty or tarnished.



Every Undertaker requires a plating outfit for repairing and finishing coffin and hearse trimmings which are soiled, tarnished or worn.

Manufacturers are making and selling tons of new tableware, jewelry, bicycles and various kinds of metal goods every month which has only a very thin plate, which, in a few weeks, wears off, making the goods unsightly, unfit for future use unless plated.

Manufacturers of new goods do no re-plating on old goods whatever, but try to force the public to throw away the old and buy new at high prices, but this only makes the plating business better.

The more new thinly plated goods sold the greater will be the demand for plating. Plate some articles for your friends and neighbors by Professor Gray's Process, and it quickly proves to them its genuineness and merit and that your plating is much thicker, will wear better and longer than a large percentage of the new goods. Your trade is then established, and within a short time you will have all the goods you can plate.

Plate a few articles for your friends, call a few weeks, a few months, or five years later, and you will find the plate satisfactory, and they will give you every article they have needing to be plated.

Factory and Warehouse of Gray & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio. Capital $100,000. Employ 200 to 300 people daily.

When you deliver the goods plated to customers they will be well pleased, in fact, delighted with the work, will pay for it promptly, and you will be given on an average twice as much work to be plated as they gave you the first time you called.

YOU CAN DO PLATING SO CHEAP

that every person can afford to have their goods plated

No tidy housekeeper will allow worn and rusty tableware to go before a guest when it can be restored and made equal to new.

No person will wear jewelry or a watch, or ride a bicycle, or use a typewriter, sewing machine, or any machine made of metal from which the plate is worn off when they see samples of your work and hear your prices. People in this day and generation are too sensible and economical to throw away their old goods and buy new when they can have their old goods re-plated for so small a cost, making them, in many cases, better than when new.

The best part of the plating business is that it increases fast and is permanent.

Put out your sign, secure your outfit, do a little work, and quickly you will be favored with orders. If you do not wish to do the plating yourself you can hire boys for $3 to $4 a week to do the work the same as we do, and solicitors to gather up goods to be plated on commission.

It is not hard work, but is pleasant, and especially so when your business is netting you $20 to $35 a week for 5 or 6 hours' work a day.

TREMENDOUS PROFITS.

The profits realized from plating are tremendous.

To plate a set of teaspoons requires only about 3c. worth of metal and chemicals; a set of knives, forks or tablespoons about 5c. worth. The balance of the price received for the work is for the agent's time and profit.

Agents usually charge from 25c. to 50c. per set for plating teaspoons, from 50c. to 75c. for tablespoons and forks, and from 60c. to $1.00 for knives.

We allow you to set your own price for plating. Get as much as you can. You will have no competition. You know what it costs to plate the goods, and all you get over cost is profit. Some agents charge much more than the above prices, while others do the work for half and still make money.

Let us start you in business for yourself at once, don't delay a single day. Be your own boss. Be a money maker. We do all kinds of plating ourselves, have had years of experience, and are headquarters for plating supplies. We manufacture our own dynamos, and outfits, all sizes, and send them out complete, with all tools, lathes, wheels and materials; everything ready for use.

We teach you everything, furnish all receipts, formulas and trade secrets free, so that failure should be impossible, and any one who follows our directions and teachings can do fine plating with a little practice, and become a money maker.

Prenatal Advice.

In The Progressive Thinker, No. 635, I notice the article on Prenatal Suggestion, etc., by Dr. W. G. Ferris. As further proof corroborating the above experiments, I would kindly refer the reader to Prof. O. S. Fowler's work on Science of Life. Let the reader get a copy of this work and read and heed its valuable teachings, especially note Sec. 2, pages 757 to 803, particularly paragraph 612, pages 782-783. Here in this work are numerous examples or proofs, showing the effects of the mother on her unborn child. Even the Bible gives numerous examples on this subject, some of them are given in this work.

In addition to the above, let the mother get "Maternity," by the same author. These works are worth their weight in gold, many times told. Let the reader also subscribe for "The Vegetarian," No. 70 McVicker's Building, Chicago, Ill., and live a vegetarian life in addition to the thoughts in above works. We find that not only outside suggestions, but any mother can bring forth children as her ideal conception of greatness that will establish the destiny and character of her unborn child's future life, that no other means can produce. Nevertheless, it is the law of creation that like produces like; therefore it is an incontrovertible fact, that the reproduction is the result of the producer.

Oh, who can estimate the bliss or woe that parents and circumstances impress on the plastic mind of the unborn, that reaches beyond the grave. Nay, even to eternity. The bringing into existence a being over which they have no control, is of so grave an importance that it ought to be a criminal offense for people to marry before maturity and especially in giving birth before they are in every way qualified to bring forth their offspring in the fullness of perfected posterity.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "putteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the sperits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never knewn what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachymaichrystal out ov the face," says he—"it's Neethar itself. It is, so it is!" says he, wiping his epistolical mouth wid the cuff of his coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. Three Remarkable Lectures that will Interest Spiritualists:—

We take pleasure in announcing that we have secured reports of three lectures on highly important subjects from the leading minds in the occult world of thought. C. W. Leadbeater, the great English psychic who travels in the astral and gathers important facts, will talk about "Dreams and Their Significance." Col. H. S. Olcott, who is perfectly familiar with occultism in India, will impart his views on the "Uses and Perils of Psychism, Spiritualism and Hypnotism." It is a masterly production, and should be read by every Spiritualist. Countess Constance Wachtmeister, a lady of remarkable psychic powers, who has won distinction in this country and Europe, will discourse upon "Psychic and Astral Developments." The Progressive Thinker leads today in everything that pertains to Spiritualism and Occultism. These three lectures will alone be worth more than a year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker. Call your neighbor's attention to the paper, and get them to subscribe and thus aid us in the great work in which we are engaged. Those who do not and will not take the paper, will still remain in ignorance of what is going on. These lectures will appear some time in April. Poor indeed must be the Spiritualist who will not pay two cents a week towards the support of the Spiritualist press.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1902.

A Black Page of History.

In a note to "The Ballad of Casandra Southwick," by Whittier, occurs the following, based on Sewell's History of the United States, pages 225-6:

"Two young persons, son and daughter of Lawrence Southwick, of Salem, Mass., who had himself been imprisoned and deprived of all his property, for having entertained two Quakers at his house, were fined ten pounds each for non-attendance at church, which they were unable to pay. The case being represented to the General Court, at Boston, that body issued an order which may be seen on the court records, bearing the signature of Edward Rawson, Secretary, by which the Treasurer of the County was 'fully empowered to SELL THE PERSONS to any of the English nation at Virginia or Barbadoes, to answer said fines.' An attempt was made to carry this barbarous order into execution, but no shipmaster was found willing to convey them to the West Indies."

We were asked by a lady a while ago, "How was it possible for the Christian religion to become so entrenched in popular favor if its foundation was fiction?" This extract from one of a multitude of somewhat similar events in the pioneer history of America, tells how its power was perpetuated. White men, of English parentage, for no offense save neglecting to attend church, were positively sold into slavery, and their blood was mingled with the African, and lost in it, because they worshiped God in other form than that prescribed by the Puritans.

Royal Brutes.

Under the head of "Royal Wife Beaters and Murderers," our Brother W. H. Burr, Esq., of Washington, depicts the brutal character of some prominent personages whose names figure in history. He begins by telling of Ivan IV of Russia, who became Czar in 1584. "He summoned 2,000 ladies to his court. After a year there were 24 left of the fair ones kept in dishonorable custody. Three months later only 12 remained." Of the 1,982 not accounted for, the intimation is they were butchered by direction of his supreme majesty, some facts being given in support of such a hypothesis. Prince Leopold of Prussia made practice of whipping the female members of his household. The brute made his wife dance with the domestics to the tune of his whip, and finally forced her to suicide.

Though several crowned heads, and their iniquitous acts and murders are mentioned, yet the names of King Henry VIII, and the Emperor Constantine do not yet appear in the list, perhaps reserved for a future paper. As Constantine is recognized as the great head of the church, whose acts it is claimed made Christianity the dominant religion, who murdered his son Crispus, his wife Fausta, his granddaughter Constantia, and several others; and King Henry gained the title of Defender of the Faith, and passed it on to his successors, they ought to appear prominent in the long list of "Royal Brutes." As King Henry was a Protestant, and the head of the Church of England, we can see the effect of his faith by the crimes against humanity of which he was guilty.

And John Calvin, the real founder of Presbyterianism, though not a king was no less than a cruel murderer, who richly merits a place with the royal brutes.

Presumptuous Folly.

In the reported proceedings of an agricultural meeting we read: "Rev. Ely asked for a blessing on those who were left at home as well for those present." This was good of the pious dominie, and it is hopeful the good God listened, and complied with the request. It would not be just to merely shower favors on those plotting to make the earth yield more bountifully, and allow those left at home to languish for the want of such favors; but, honestly good reader, is it probable divine Providence will turn aside, or change his action on account of such supplication? Is it not presumptuous in a mortal to thus thrust himself before the Great Father, who has all the limitless universe in his keeping, and ask him to bestow special favors on so insignificant a creature as man, when compared with the mighty whole?

"Death Defeated; or the Psychic Secret of How to Keep Young." By J. M. Peebles, M. D., M. A., Ph. D. Price $1. For sale at this office.

Another Acquisition to Truth.

Prof. Pearson, at the head of the English literary department, in the Northwestern University, has resigned his chair, and will vacate so soon as a successor is found. He asked for a letter of dismissal from the Methodist church, of which he was a member. This at first was granted but was afterwards withdrawn. Why? Because the Professor had become convinced there were numerous errors in the Bible; that it is not infallible, and that many of the pretended miracles were not miracles.

Prof. Pearson has been thirty years in the service of his church. It is conceded he is a superior teacher, faultless in character, but with his advanced education he has reached the same conclusion with the ablest minds of the age, and he had the manliness to give publicity to his convictions. Pulpits, and professors' chairs in colleges and universities all over the world are filled by persons who mentally repudiate the entire Bible as an inspired book; they repudiate the creeds generally, but to so announce in their places is to cut off the means of support, so they live on to the end suppressing the truth.

In our late symposium it was an absolute pleasure to observe that the old Spiritualists, they who have been many years outside the church, almost invariably repudiated the claim that ours is a religion. They maintained that it is no way related to the creeds, or the superstitions on which they were built, but they insist it is a science; that it is not the creature of faith, but of knowledge, and we frankly own we are with them in this position.

A Bad Precedent.

Miss Ellen M. Stone, a missionary sent out from America to Christianize the heathen of Bulgaria, captured some five and a half months ago by brigands, and held for ransom, is reported to be released, with her companion in captivity, Mrs. Tsilka. The brigands demanded $110,000 for her release, but it is understood they finally accepted $70,000 for Miss Stone, the other captive being thrown in as a gratuity.

Will not this case serve as a precedent, applicable to all missionaries, and ensure their capture in expectation of a large ransom? After having supplied the cannibal islanders for many years with their choicest roasts, is it not now probable the exhausted exchequers of impecunious princes will be filled to repletion by ransom money? Even China, at $70,000 a head on missionaries, can soon pay off her great indebtedness fastened on her because of the national dislike to these disturbers of her tranquillity, and the bad way they exhibited in showing such dislike.

The young and the adventurous who have been ambitious in showing their zeal in the interests of the church, and have coveted a mission to foreign countries, will, in all human probability, acquaint themselves with the adventures of Miss Stone, among a band of rude barbarians, who was hustled from camp to camp in snow-clad mountain fastnesses, much of the time short of warmth and food, as a possible culmination of their own experience in "saving souls."

And again: It is merely possible the ransom funds will fall short after a time, and the adventurer may get a blow on the head to extinguish his ardor for the Christian faith. This fact may bid him pause.

Compelled to Apologize.

It appears from the New York World, that Spiritualism and orthodoxy have clashed in St. Andrew's Church, in Harlem, and the rector, the Rev. Dr. George L. Van De Water, will publish in this week's issue of the church paper a letter in which it is said he will modify opinions expressed by him on Spiritualism.

Dr. Van De Water is a friend and admirer of Prof. James Hyslop, of Columbia University. Dr. Van De Water is chaplain of the university. Prof. Hyslop aroused a storm of criticism recently by his indorsement of Spiritualism.

Dr. Van De Water has been giving a series of Lenten lectures on "Remarkable Women." A week ago last Thursday one of his parishioners died. He had been treated by physicians for a long time, and they were apparently unable to diagnose his case. He expressed a desire that a clairvoyant be summoned to his bedside. A woman clairvoyant was secured and she told the patient he was suffering from cancer of the stomach and advised an immediate operation.

Physicians were summoned and the patient insisted on an operation. This was performed and the surgeons found the clairvoyant's diagnosis to be correct. The patient died the day following the operation, and Dr. Van De Water, who was called, learned of the case.

At last Wednesday's lecture Dr. Van De Water dwelt on the story at some length and, without mentioning the parishioner's name, recalled the cunning of the clairvoyant who had succeeded where the physicians had failed.

"This is a modern example of Spiritualism," he said. "There are many strange things in the occult realm which we cannot affirm, yet cannot deny."

Then he told of occult manifestations and, while not giving them his sanction, he would not deny them. About 1,000 of his congregation listened and a stormy discussion followed. Dr. Van De Water was censured, and physicians who were present denounced him. Prof. Hyslop's name was brought into the discussion. Dr. Van De Water replied that he had been misunderstood, and sought to smooth the matter over.

Protests from members of his congregation have been sent to Dr. Van De Water since the lecture, and it is said that pressure was brought to bear which resulted in his framing a letter of apology.

Ignorance Vs. Education

It is a strangely anomalous exhibition in these days of the general diffusion of knowledge, such as is to be gained from systematic instruction in schools of learning, when one sets out in all seriousness and earnestness, to decry education for mediums or any class of public teachers.

Some will so far expose their lack of education even of the most elementary sort, as to declare to this effect:

"I haint got no use fer book larnin nohow. The sperits teaches ME, and that's good enough, I reckon. Its better'n any o' yer hifalutin school larnin an sich. I don't read the Spiritooal newspapers, nuther; fer I gits edication, all I need, from the sperits. The sperits an' the fernonemy is good enough fer me. I haint got no use fer yer Banners an' Progressive Thinkers, fer the sperits teaches me all I want to know."

It is said as an objection to schools of training, that education begets prejudice, etc. But who ever knew prejudice more dogmatic and unreasonable than in persons of dense ignorance in matters of common education? Such are of the class that will doggedly assert that "the teachin' at the schools is all wrong; why, my gals tells that this arth is round like a ball, an' turns over every 24 hours; an' that can't be true, fer the water would all fall out o' the mill-pond, ef it did, an' I've rid miles and miles, an' the arth is all flat, 'cept some hills, jest as fur as I could see. They can't make me believe any o' their new-fangled stuff as the books teaches. An' the Bible tells about the four corners of the arth, too."

Suppose some wise spirit should try to teach the truth through such prejudice begotten of ignorance! Let it be remembered that ignorance has its prejudices, as well as education—and nothing but education can overcome it.

More or less has been said and written about sending a young person to a training school to "learn how to become a medium."

We have no knowledge of any training or other school that proposes to do any such thing. If the objectors will kindly designate such a school, we will be obliged for the information. Until they do this, we shall feel that we have a right to class the objection as another instance of prejudice begotten of ignorance.

No, the training schools and other projected institutions of learning are not for the purpose of teaching the young "how to become mediums," as any one may ascertain by their curriculums of study, or by applying at the proper source for information. They are intended and established for the purpose of giving helpful and needful instruction in branches essential to every person who would fit himself for public work, and not disgrace himself and Spiritualism by public exhibitions of gross defects in his education.

Mediums are not made by education; but education need not necessarily make them less mediumistic. We think it is a fact that the most effective public mediums are not the most ignorant and uneducated ones, but those who can and do manifest in their work so fair a degree of education as not to be guilty of gross transgressions of correct forms of speech, to say nothing of other lapses into the limbo of dense ignorance.

Do these objectors to education realize that their objections to training schools, etc., are in reality pleas for ignorance as more valuable than education? for uncultured mentality as preferable to intelligence and mental culture?

"Ignorance is the mother of devotion," was the motto of the old church, and hence she fostered ignorance in her devotees. Are Spiritualists to take up and re-echo the old church's refrain and declare that ignorance is the mother of mediumship, in these modern days of the grand and glorious march of education and knowledge?

Is there any evidence that the mediumship of ignorance is of more value to the world than the mediumship of persons who are well educated?

Would Edison's work be grander and of more use to the world if his was the brain of an uneducated ignoramus?

Would Sir Wm. Crookes' value to the world and to Spiritualism be greater if he were uncultured in the technical education of the schools?

Would Moses Hull, Dr. J. M. Peebles, Hudson Tuttle, J. Clegg Wright, and others, noted men and women honored in the annals of Spiritualism, whose labors have done so much for the upbuilding of our Cause—would their work have been nobler, grander, better, more effective, if their craniums had been stunted repositories of invincible ignorance?

Would the tuneful brain of a Carlyle Petersilea be more harmoniously responsive to the touch of angel fingers, if instead of the thorough musical education he received from the German and other masters in music, he had gone on in life without a thorough technical education in all the principles of music? On the contrary, has not his education been a help, rather than a detriment?

There is room and need for a noble work to be done for Spiritualism by training schools and the Morris Pratt Institute, in the line of imparting a liberal education under Spiritualistic influences.

There may be prejudices against Spiritualism arising from the sectarian influences of colleges generally. There will be none of this prejudice springing from the education, environments and general influence of such a school as the Morris Pratt Institute is intended to be by its founders—therefore it should receive the hearty and generous support of Spiritualists.

1848 An Anniversary 1902
of Deeds—Not Words Alone.

Chicago Spiritualists and their friends are invited to make ready to attend a benefit for the medium's home established at Reed City, Mich., by the National Spiritualists' Association. It will be given on Saturday evening, April 5, in the Auditorium Hall, No. 77 Thirty-first street.

The programme from 7:45 to 9:30 o'clock will consist of music and messages by excellent talent, after which there will be dancing until 2 a. m.

Every medium in the city is asked to co-operate towards the financial success of the enterprise. The object sought is of greater importance than the gain of any individual, or single coterie of men and women. Let there be no jealousies but rather a worthy rivalry as to who most can work and best agree. No other sect wholly neglects its worn-out workers.

Admission to programme and ball, 50 cents. The tickets of admission will be tasty in design, and belong to the purchasers as souvenirs of the evening. Friends in the city or state who are unable to attend may add their contributions by sending orders, accompanied by cash, to Geo. B. Warne, chairman, 4203, Evans avenue, who will return souvenirs to the applicants.

All mediums who will aid in this effort, are asked to forward their names and numbers forthwith, to W. J. Elmo, 3117 Wabash avenue, who will see that they appear on the advertising matter which will be widely scattered.

Executive Committee: Geo. B. Warne, W. J. Elmo, A. H. Bliss, A. J. Cutler, Ervin A. Rice, J. Kirby Smith, T. S. Russell, D. Stearns White, Charles B. Quinlan, Mrs. J. R. Francis, Mrs. H. A. Cross, Mrs. Ella Johnson Bloom.

Narrow with Age.

It is a stupendous fact that as men grow old they grow fixed (set in their ways of thinking and acting) in whatever groove they have meandered through life. If they have had full charge of public affairs, as Gladstone had of those of England; and almost of all Europe, they may broaden as they grow old, but are bound to narrow down to a fixedness akin to the feeling of infallibility along lines of their life devotions. Gladstone paid little attention to the religion of England, but devoted his time to the business propositions and made the reign of Queen Victoria a success and a rather peaceful reign.

We mention this Grand Old Man to show that when the mind of man is confined to one channel it becomes fixed in that channel almost to the exclusion of all else, with approaching age and the end upon earth.

For those who think broad there is surely a broader unfoldment with age, but for those who narrow down to gaining and piling up, and that only, there is a gradual narrowing with age.

When a man leaves his rollicking boyhood and buries himself entirely in the thought of getting rich, gathering and hoarding, gaining more, more! more!! all his broadness, all his broader aspirations leave him and he can enjoy naught but his gold, his land, his worldly possessions, and to this channel he narrows down, and grows less sociable, less liberal and more miserly with age.

It is just as easy to grow broad as it is to grow narrow. It is as easy to unfold into greatness as to contract the soul.

True, birth and environment have much to do in the matter; so it has with the tree of the forest, the bird that builds its nest among its branches, the insect that burrows into its trunk and prevents its rapid growth; so it has with everything else known to man; but you may twist two young hickory saplings together and together they will grow, twisted, to be sure, according to environment.

Man, intelligent man can often choose his own environment. He can bury himself in business and away from all social surroundings until he will be as much out of place in society as an overgrown schoolboy in a kindergarten with the babes. He will lose all desire for company and become morose, sullen and dyspeptic; a bore to those with whom he must associate and a piece of wretchedness to himself.

To say that one must travel in the road of his father or mother, or, in the road they made for him at birth, places a limitation upon the spirit of man, its possibilities as an independent entity; it makes the soul a slave to manners and customs and ceremonies of past ages.

Edison was born, no doubt, with the spark of a genius in him, but had he in early life plunged into and buried himself in the mire of greed and selfishness instead of unfolding the best and broadest within him, he would not have been the electrical wizard that he is, and the world would not have had the benefit of his birth and unfoldment that it has.

It is right and natural to accumulate enough to prevent want and misery that often come with age, but to become a multi-millionaire and continue to pile up even on the very threshold of another world is but the effect of becoming fixed in the rut of greed. It becomes a mania, an insanity and cramps the soul.

The Mysterious Workings of Nature.

Nature is peculiar, and some of her methods are exceedingly mysterious. According to the Kansas City Journal, a case illustrating mediumship or some undefinable action of the brain, has come to light there. Without even being able to distinguish one figure from another, Stevie Ghiggeri, aged 6 years, whose home is at 1228 Baltimore avenue, adds, subtracts, multiplies and divides with the rapidity of a trained mathematician. This youthful prodigy is the son of Felix Ghiggeri, a fruit vender, whose stand is at No. 5 West Ninth street.

How the little fellow is able to solve mathematical problems as he does is a mystery to his parents, relatives and himself. He never spent a day in his life in school and has no knowledge of letters or figures whatever. No one has ever taught him the meaning of figures nor given him any instructions in mathematics: Still no problem in figures involving less than four figures is too hard for him.

By way of explanation of his wonderful power the boy, who is still nothing more than a baby and talks in babyish accents, simply says, "I gets 'em figgers out uf my head."

The fact that the little fellow possessed such extraordinary powers of computation was first discovered recently by J. M. Findlay, deputy sheriff. Mr. Findlay dropped into the fruit store of the child's father, and in talking to the little fellow, asked him how many apples a customer would get for a nickel.

"Five," returned the boy.

"How many for 20 cents?" asked Findlay.

"Twenty," was the little fellow's answer almost before the question had been fairly asked.

The boy's aptness in mathematics thus displayed caused Findlay to question him further, and in this way his wonderful powers of computation were revealed.

When seen by a reporter at his home last night the little boy seemed pleased to be questioned in mathematical problems.

"How much is ten times ten?" was asked as a starter.

"One hundred," came the answer instantaneously.

"How do you know it is?"

"Don't know. I dot it here," returned the prodigy, pointing to his head.

"How much is twice forty-five?"

"Ninety."

"Three times 150?"

"Four hundred and fifty."

"How much is twice 330?"

"Six hundred and sixty," returned the six-year-old boy without hesitation.

The child was examined in many other mathematical ways and in each instance he was ready with the correct answer almost as soon as the question was fairly asked.

Thinking to ascertain where the child got his wonderful education in figures, the reporter asked: "Stevie, did you ever go to school?"

"No."

"Where did you learn to answer questions like those you have just heard?"

"I dunno; dess I pict it up."

The child's parents are at a loss to know where the little fellow learned what he knows about figuring.

"I was very much surprised," said Mr. Ghiggeri yesterday, "to find out that he could figure as he does. He never spent a day of his life in school, and we have never taught him. He cannot read and does not know one figure from another. His aptness in figuring is something we cannot understand. Where he got his learning is a mystery to his mother and me."

"We intend to send him to school next year," said Mrs. Ghiggeri. "He will be 7 years old then. We did not send him this year, as he was not 6 when school opened, and we thought him too young. I cannot account for his ability to work out mathematical problems."

Stevie Ghiggeri is the only boy in the Ghiggeri family. He has three sisters, all of whom are under 12 years of age. His parents are Italians, having come to Kansas City twenty-one years ago from Genoa.

THE JACKMAN LIBEL SUIT.

We read and appreciated the full statement and testimony of the libel suit, and I am glad it is before the public in its true light. The Lily Dale camp fathers have been reticent, and no doubt their silence has been construed against them and used to the advantage of frauds, but now there is no excuse for any defense of the unprincipled schemers and despoilers of the most sacred ideals and blessings. Mrs. Aber Jackman may be, and I think is, a medium, but such misdirection of her gifts deserves all she has got and I am glad to know that in this case is verified the poet's words, that "ever the right comes uppermost and ever is justice done." But it is often slow in coming. Yours for honest work,

SPIRITS INDUCE A DREAM

And a Lost Baby Is Found, Surrounded by Coyotes.

A three-year-old baby, the daughter of Adam Gunther, a wealthy ranchman, wandered away from her home, northwest of the town of Henderson, yesterday afternoon, and was found at 1:30 this morning in the mud of a "draw" up to her knees and surrounded by coyotes. She was awake, unharmed and not even crying. The strangest part of the story is that a woman's dream directed the searchers to the child. John McClary and Henry Dierks, two ranchmen, found her. Fully a hundred men were out with the searching party.

Adam Gunther has lived at Henderson only a week. He is a wealthy farmer, and bought his ranch from John Scott Lee recently. He has three daughters; only the oldest one goes to school. Yesterday afternoon about 4 o'clock the second child and the baby were playing outside in the warm sun. Mrs. Gunther was busy in the house, and the elder child came in, leaving the baby alone.

It was only a few minutes before the mother thought to look for the baby, but she was gone. Mrs. Gunther hunted quickly over the limited space about the house, and then called several men who were working on the house.

The news that a baby was lost on the bleak prairie started every man who heard it on the run. There was no walking in that party; spreading out to cover as much ground as possible the men ran like quartering game dogs, scrutinizing closely every tuft of aloe, running down the line of every ditch, dropping into every arroyo.

By dark thirty men were hunting. The news still spread with incredible rapidity, considering the thinly-settled nature of the place. Men gave up after four or five hours of ceaseless running, but so fast were the recruits coming that long before midnight a hundred men were scouring the prairie, all on the dead run.

Dark was no sooner down than coyotes began to be heard.

As night wore on the tireless search became more desperate. Every inch of ground to the eastward had been scoured for a mile, the party spreading out fan-wise as it moved.

Far in the van were John Stockton and John McCleary, and in the dead middle of the night, they came to the ranch of L. J. Brantner, a mile and a quarter east of Gunther's. They knocked and shouted to the people, half-awakened within, asking possible news of the missing baby. The Brantners tumbled out just as everybody else had done, to join the hunt.

Mrs. Brantner heard the talk and came to the door, her eyes astare at a coincidence she could hardly believe.

"Why—why—I was just dreaming about that lost baby," she said. "I saw her perfectly well, and if you'll follow down the line fence to the foot of that second draw or arroyo, and then go up the draw, I believe you'll find her."

The men started again on the run, leaving Brantner to follow as soon as he could get his shoes on. Under the cloud-dimmed moon they hunted, back and forth, calling, and expecting, if they found the baby at all, to come upon her sound asleep in a ditch, or even—the constant howling of the coyotes carried a dreadful suggestion, that became more awful every lost minute.

McCleary was ahead of the general line because he was sure he was on the best trail. Several times during the night he had found the footprints that told him where the baby had crossed the soft ground of a ditch.

Suddenly he stopped, listening.

He heard nothing for a moment, but he was sure he had heard a sound that did not belong to the prairie.

Another man, Henry Dierks, came running over the crest of a rise in the prairie, calling as he came. McCleary called him over and together they listened. A perfect chorus of howls from the coyotes was all at first—then a tiny cough.

Strange things happen on the prairie. John McCleary shuddered as he noticed that he was at the foot of the very draw Mrs. Brantner had sent him to, guided by a dream.

Both men plunged into the arroyo, and as they went down, saw to their horror a scampering, scattering bunch of coyotes run up over the bank and disappear.

McCleary went straight, shouting, to the spot the coyotes had left. There stood the baby, knee-deep and stuck in the arroyo's mud, bareheaded, blue with cold, her little brown coat dragging in the water.

She was not crying; apparently she was not frightened.

But she was very glad to see the big ranchman, who choked up as he drew her from the bog, and stripped his coat off to wrap around her.

Dierks climbed the bank and fired his six-shooter in the air and swung his lantern. From all sides the men came running, but McCleary was trudging back through the night to the Brantner ranch, the baby asleep in his arms.—Denver Post.

Flammarion.

The Spiritualists of France have experienced a serious setback in the recantation of the astronomer, Flammarion, of his belief in occult manifestations. Flammarion has for some time been an enthusiastic Spiritualist and, as a scientist of renown, has been a great promoter of their cult. His friend Caseneuve, an expert prestidigitator, undertook to undecide him. After long arguments, being unable to shake the confidence of the astronomer in the genuineness of the spirit miracles, he offered to reproduce in the presence of the Spiritualists themselves everything that they claimed to be supernatural, by material methods.

Flammarion accepted the challenge and the feats that Caseneuve was called upon to duplicate were agreed upon. When the time for the test came, Caseneuve succeeded in demonstrating his ability to reproduce every manifestation of the Spiritualist seances. The Spiritualists then alleged that Caseneuve had accomplished his feats by means of spiritism and that he was himself a medium. Then the sleight-of-hand man proceeded to show all his methods and his apparatus and repeat every one of his manifestations in broad daylight, in the presence of Flammarion and his witnesses explaining everything plainly as he went along. Flammarion was convinced and formally renounced his belief in occultism.—Lincoln (Neb.) Jorunal.

Had Flammarion been in this country, he would have had no occasion for recanting. France is behind the times in spirit phenomena.

The Religion of Science

A Lecture Delivered in San Francisco, California, January 26th, 1902, by Charles Dawbarn.

The 19th century has been specially distinguished by man's success in climbing above the tinder-box level of his ancestors. Even the tinder-box was a great advance upon the yet older method of getting a light by rubbing two sticks. The history of human thought is thus a history of man's limitations at every step. But now that the 19th century has given us the brilliant lamp, the Welsbach mantle and the electric light, the time has come to discard some of our remaining superstitions. At the beginning of the century this little world was still counted as a sort of divine restaurant, with the sun, moon and stars to wait upon the tables. Of course this conception was born of man's self conceit. But to the great mass, even of thinkers, the entire scheme of creation still stands as a graduated scale that may be roughly noted as fish, tadpole, frog, monkey, man, God. Just a hop, skip and a jump from microbe to man, who then shakes hands with Deity, as a prince of the royal family. That there are just as many gradations of intelligent life above man as there are below him has not been a possible conception in any of the various theologies with which ignorant man has been blessed or cursed as he has wended his way upward. The 19th century has been alive with intelligence, culminating to-day in what calls itself the New Thought. But even the New Thought is still hitched to the old tinder-box, as I propose to show in this lecture.

Let us commence with a brief definition of religion and science, which are words we are using every day to express certain thoughts. By religion I mean man's conception of a supreme being as an object for worship, and to whom he looks up as his creator. Science comprises the collection and orderly arrangement of facts, of which it is the province of the scientific philosopher to learn the lesson.

Now what can we really know, or even conceive of this Supreme Being, or Great First Cause as he is termed by some? Since it has been discovered that all space is full of the raw material out of which everything is made—substance, energy, intelligence, which in unmanufactured form we call "ether"—the old idea of a Creator making everything out of his own will power has become impossible. We discover substance, energy, intelligence in the tiniest atom, and the whole of these atoms necessarily constitute what man tries to conceive as an object for worship. Our conception of an Infinite First Cause must include Cosmos with its myriads of blazing suns, among which this little world of ours is not even as a grain of sand upon the sea shore. So we have the atom at one end of our religious scale, and all the atoms, which we call God, at the other. But the tinder-box man lets Cosmos severely alone, and surveying his little planet declares it took a whole big God to make it. Let us test his tinder-box logic in the light of to-day.

In yonder shop we watch the manufacture of dynamos. When we stand before the perfected machine it never occurs to us to say "God made that dynamo." But the tinder-box man, who had not watched the mechanic at his job, would have said that not so very long ago, and would have burned the man who denied it. Science has now taught us that this planet of ours is a big dynamo, revolving in space, and utilizing the very same forces or energy as the little dynamo. Even the scientist acknowledges that dynamos do not make themselves. But that is not saying that the mechanic of the big dynamo is a god. It merely means that he knows more, and wields more power than the mechanic who makes the little dynamo. Thus the intelligent thinker of to-day stands with all the self-conceit of the tinder-box era knocked out of him, and is compelled to acknowledge a being with superior intelligence as between himself and his old conception of God.

Next comes a very important question. What are our relations to this world builder, and what are his relations to us? In other words, what is the extent and limit of his power? Here we call upon science to give us some solid facts before we reply, and we find them in an everyday illustration. Here is an ocean steamer, which embodies, perhaps, the uttermost of mortal man's creative ability. Down in its depths are furnaces fed by slaves of the fire. They are literally in hell, but must stay there or that steamer will be useless. Upon deck, and in the luxurious cabins we may well, by constrast, call it heaven. So in its present conditions heaven rests upon hell, and cannot get on without it. Take out even one stoker from hell, and you must replace him or there will be trouble in heaven. It is no use that stoker calling upon the maker of that steamer for help in his trouble. As it is to-day, somebody must stoke in hell or the vessel stops. We see at once that the remedy for the ills from which that stoker is suffering is beyond the power of the maker of any dynamo, whether big or little. Intelligence must go to work to learn how to do the stoker's work without any stoker, before heaven can get on without its furnace slaves.

This simple illustration tells us that the maker of the big dynamo, like the maker of the little dynamo, cannot yet make a heaven that does not rest on a hell. The slums of civilization and the savage cruelties of man towards his helpless fellow all attest that our little dynamo is to-day a fighting proposition as bloody as that of the old Aztec. Of course that is a shock to the tinder-box mind that is preaching that God is love. But it is truth, all the same, and it leaves us ready to take another step.

Having determined that our little planet dynamo has a maker, and that he cannot get outside present conditions, our next question is as to how much he really knows of what is going on in our lives. We will return to the question of a creator's love a little further on in our study.

Suppose the possessor of the most brilliant intellect now alive undertook to play the guardian angel to an ant-hill. He already knows that certain ant races have a civilization in some respects superior to our own, for there is not a trace of individual selfishness among the million inhabitants of a flourishing ant city. But he also knows that they quarrel and fight with other races, so he starts in to improve their ethics. Alas! he soon finds that his intelligence and that of the ant cannot contact at any single point. He cannot even guess how they talk to one another, or plan their wonderful engineering successes. So at last convinced that he is limited to his own expression of intelligence, and cannot reach that of the ant, he retires from the attempt. Is not that exactly the position of the maker of our little world? If he does not exchange thought with the microbe and the ant how can he think the thoughts of a tinder-box man who knows no better than to kneel down and worship him as the inventor of the friction matches called suns and stars, up in the sky.

Some may ask what then can be his object in manufacturing our planet dynamo out of the raw material of Cosmos? Science offers us a very suggestive fact by way of reply. You all know something of the limitations of man's senses. For instance, man hears vibrations that do not exceed some 80,000 to the second. Between that record and some 400 millions of millions of vibrations in the Cosmic ether he is blind and deaf and dumb, and finds nothing he can touch or taste. For him it is an awful gap. But that does not mean that it is empty. The scientist makes a retort. He then pumps out the air and calls it a vacuum. Nature laughs at him. It is just as full of the raw material of everything as ever. Nature is there with her ether, and her attraction which he calls gravitation, pays no attention to his puny attempt to push it out of his way. So there can be no such thing as a vacuum, and wherever there is the raw material there intelligence is in activity according to the conditions existing. So we see that those conditions in that "awful gap" are altogether outside our sense limits. That means, as a fair scientific inference, that mighty civilizations are around and about us of which we know nothing, and which, most probably can no more contact with us than we can contact with the ant. And such civilizations, of which we know nothing, may contain the real reasons for the first manufacture of this world dynamo of ours. It is possible that citizens of that interior civilization may be able to contact with the maker, though we cannot. They may thus offer ample motive for their creation out of Cosmic world stuff by a superior intelligence. This is certainly a suggestion justified by scientific discovery up to date.

But man is far above the level of the lower forms of life. He has attained some knowledge to prove that, even if he does not stand next to God, he yet has an immortality of his own, and an Aural Selfhood which endows him with high privileges. Let us see what this means.

Those who laugh at prayer to an outside intelligence, and deny its use are thinking only of the tinder-box conception of Deity. Watch the poor stoker at the furnace and hear his cry to God for help to escape from his hell. We have seen that his whole conception of God is a tinder-box idea, but his prayer goes out all the same. So stoker Tom prays, and it happens that spirit Jim, himself once a stoker, hears that prayer, and says "that means me." Off goes his spirit jacket, and with might and main he pulls stoker Tom to a higher level. But remember that just as long as present conditions exist some other poor fellow must take stoker Tom's place or the ship will stop. So both prayer and spirit return are to-day demonstrated facts as eternal truths. Shut off the old tinder-box mortal self-conceit, and prayer is discovered to be one of the practical forces of life. But it is intelligence alone which will learn how to someday run our world dynamo without stoker or furnace. The Socialist's pet idea is to make the man at the top help to stoke. That man naturally objects. The real remedy is to do away with stokers altogether. When intelligence can draw its food direct from the atmosphere the goal will be in sight, and not till then.

Now a word or two on this much vaunted assertion of God's love. New Thought men and women shout "God is love," which is a tinder-box assertion. Stoker Tom says "If God made me and put me here, all talk of his love is just a bold-faced lie. And Tom is right, from his standpoint.

Man's progress in the 19th century has been the result of his learning how to use the natural forces around him. Electricity, like every other expression of energy, has always existed. When man got in its road he was always injured, and often killed. When he learned to keep in line with it he soon found it would turn his shafting. So he hitched on his belts, and the machines he had invented began to hum with the song of the Almighty Dollar. That was the secret. Just keep in line with a natural force. Don't go criss-cross, or you get hurt. There is all the power you want if you hitch on from the side. Keep away from the front or down you go.

But electricity is only one of Nature's forces. There is a far mightier force known to us to-day as mental energy. It is the power through which man has learned to control electricity. It is the power which invents and improves until man grows more manly with each passing year. But man was not in line with this force in the tinder-box era. And it is chiefly in the last century he has been leaving the tinder-box behind. And even to-day the force feels some of the old shackles holding back these New Thought men and women. They cannot get rid of the old idea that God is love. They still believe it is fish, tadpole, frog, monkey, man, God.

I would affectionately suggest to these good brothers and sisters, now in the very front rank of human progress, that mental power is Nature's mightiest force, far mightier than electricity. But, also like electricity, get in its road, and you are injured instead of helped. Man has always, through his tinder-box ignorance, been getting in its road. And the world maker has undoubtedly got in its road too. All life lives upon life. As a consequence we have the hells of life in every clime, and in every age, founded upon selfishness. That is mental power misapplied. We have battles in the field with rapid fire guns and smokeless powder. We have battles in the slums, fought with starvation as the weapon. We have disease, cruel suffering and unnecessary death, all because man has been getting in the road of this mightiest form of energy. And, for the most part, the scientist who could line with electricity, has failed to line with mental power. There were too many dollars in his road. The New Thought man and woman has been trying, all unconsciously, to get into line with this mighty force, and, in some respects, has already made a glorious success. But we must recognize that perfect harmony with mental power would mean perfect love. For love is simply the harmonious action of this mightiest of forces. That is love, and nothing short of that is worthy of the name. Every unselfish attempt to bless man, whether by hand or brain power, is, by so much, getting into line with mental energy. Already thousands of poor sufferers have had occasion to bless this Thought power. The tremendous growth of the Christian Church is founded on the fact that its members have been personally helped by it. But it clings to the old tinder-box. Its God is love, and stands next to the man he is supposed to have created.

If you heard a scientist declare that God was electricity, you would look at the dynamo and smile. But God is no more love than he is electricity. In fact the tinder-box God is nowhere, and everywhere, but always unapproachable. The actual maker of earth cannot reach you, and you cannot reach him. But you have precisely the same forces to work with that he wields. You can certainly wield this mental power so harmoniously that you can almost do away with hells of poverty, suffering, disease; and indefinitely delay the disintegration of your forms which men call death. Mental Scientists are already traveling that road, but still hoppled by the old thought that man is next to the head of creation. And in addition working with only one hand, since they refuse all help from the brother and sister of the invisible.

When man gets into full line with mental power I verily believe he will learn how to run his furnaces and slums so as to annihilate the present horror-dens of mortal life. But that is not yet in sight, for the man of to-day may have a friction match in one hand, but he holds fast to his tinder-box with the other. Nevertheless it is in the aspiration for full harmony with mental power—the force that becomes love—that the scientist finds the religion which uplifts his soul, and develops his manhood.

THE GODLESS AND DEVILLESS CLUB.

It Pays a High Tribute of Respect to the Tombs Angel.

The President opened the last meting with the following remarks:

My dearly beloved members, no incident in all the sacrifice of human life connected with the Park Avenue hotel fire, New York, will touch more hearts than that of the untimely death of a slight and frail woman whose life was devoted to the comfort and, where possible, the succoring of her erring sisters—Mrs. John A. Foster, the "Tombs angel."

Caught in her room on the sixth floor of the hotel—a room which she had occupied for the past five years, ever since, in fact, she gave up her home life in a charming house at Thirty-seventh street and Park avenue that she might have more time to devote to her charges in the police courts and the various branches of the city prison—Mrs. Foster was imprisoned by flame and smoke and perished, none of the "all"-powerful Gods of the vast universe coming to her rescue—no, not one.

Mrs. Foster was the widow of a wealthy New Yorker, a genera' of volunteers, differing from the usual type of volunteer missionaries engaged in prison work. Mrs. Foster won sympathy and respect from the roughest characters, wardens, keepers and policemen. Magistrates regarded her, not in the light of a nuisance, but a friend. After her husband's death she devoted her whole life to giving personal aid to prisoners waiting for trial.

Mrs. Foster first took up her work by accidentally going to court in behalf of a son of an old family servant who had been accused of stealing a watch and who had no lawyer.

She attended daily at the Patrick trial and has especially interested herself in the case of Florence Burns, whom she believed entirely innocent. She was a very handsome and in appearance an aristocratic woman. Her sympathy and tact made the most hardened criminals love and revere her. She had many times proved innocent persons unjustly accused of crime.

Mrs. Foster said in court to a reporter for the American, in what was probably the last statement she made about her life work, that she expected to free Florence Burns, who, she said, she believed was entirely innocent of the shooting of Walter S. Brooks in the Glen Island hotel. Her assertion that Florence Burns was innocent, Mrs. Foster said she based not on sentiment but on fact in her possession which she would use.

Mrs. Foster was found among the dead by her daughter. The ring by which she was identified was a present from her deceased husband. It bore this inscription: "My Own, My Dear, Feb. 26, 1866." Mrs. Foster's body was removed from the hotel to the home of her daughter, Mrs. Walter C. Bowers, 12 East Twelfth street.

Here we find an earthly angel, shining with a refulgence that was truly sublime. Always radiant with the sunshine of cheerfulness, always divinely hopeful in her angelic mission, she shone forth like a diamond in a muddy pool when, compared with the aristocratic 400 of New York. What a beautiful life she led in her glorious work on earth. Her mission was to give hope to the hardened criminal; to defend those whom she believed to be innocent, and to introduce into darkened places rays of God's sunshine.

At this instant pandemonium reigned in the Godless and Devilless Club. Every member was on his feet, shouting and gesticulating wildly. The very air was lurid with the fiery words. Some of the members stood on the chairs, others on the table, and such a scene had never before been witnessed in the Club. The President stood speechless and deadly pale, while confusion reigned supreme. He did not realize what was the matter—could not understand why so many were gesticulating wildly and shouting, "Mr. President," at the top of their voices. Finally order was partially restored, and the President called upon one of the shouting members to explain. He did so.

"Mr. President, in your address you spoke of God's sunshine, and it was that expression that has caused all the trouble and confusion. As you well understand, the members of this Club have no God, hence it is absurd to speak of his sunshine. It was unparliamentary, undignified, and the offense is of sufficient gravity to have you impeached, and expelled from the order."

The President than arose and said: "I plead guilty of a grave offense. Heredity, early education and youthful environments have so moulded my brain functions that in spite of myself, I use expressions which I do not endorse myself. I ask pardon the second time of the Club, and hope in the future to avoid this disagreeable pitfall."

The pardon was graciously given, and perfect harmony again reigned in the Godless and Devilless Club.

[The President then took up the thread of his remarks following God's sunshine.]

The Tombs angel combined the mortal and the angel, the human and the divine, in an extraordinary degree. Her whole life was a poem of exquisite sweetness that will go down in history when all the modern poets shall have been forgotten.

It is a great pleasure to dwell upon such a life, so lovely, so transcendentally pure, bringing to earth every quality that made her angelic in every respect. It requires something of an effort to leave wealth, fashion, aristocracy, the influence of the "400" millionaire magnates, the plaudits of admirers, and the fulsome praise of cringing sycophants, to become in its broadest sense a Tombs Angel—one of the highest, perhaps, that ever came to earth.

Though not a devoted member of the Godless and Devilless Club, she nevertheless was a faithful representative of one of its cardinal principles—"Do everything possible for others." She worshipped a God; she devoutly believed in one; she thought that in her high and exalted mission she was drawing near to some divine being, and so she was.

Just in proportion as you do good, just in proportion as you unselfishly work for the unfortunate and downtrodden, those depressed and suffering from poverty, just in that proportion the windows of heaven seem to open, and angel faces peer through them to observe you, and send forth their approving smiles of love and recognition. Just in the degree that you are an angel on earth, just in that degree angel associates approach you. Your life and conduct here shows exactly what your spirit visitants are. The high and exalted spirit visitants do not approach the putrid character unless specially invited by some radiant spot therein indicating a desire for cleanliness.

In this Tombs Angel we have a wonderfully suggestive lesson. She pinned her faith in God, as set forth in the Bible; she worshiped him, prayed to him, asked his special guidance and love, yet in the hour of her extreme peril, in that agony that defies description, when a fire roaring like hideous demons, surrounded her, and the scene one of hellish cruelty, the God she so devoutly adored, neglected to rescue her.

Alas! Alas! Confidence misplaced!

Love directed to the wrong personage! Belief shattered by unrealized hopes.

A cherished Divine Being proving a worthless staff on which to lean.

This Tombs Angel learned, alas! too late that a God could not be depended upon to extinguish a fire, or to save one's life therefrom.

When will the world learn a needed lesson, and recognize the sublime fact, that there is no God in all this vast universe that responds to a danger signal?

We are living in a world of Cause and Effect. We know the effect even if we do not realize the cause.

The Godless and Devilless Club being divorced from all belief in the existence of a God, stands on a pedestal where the vista is more extended than it would otherwise be, and it surveys the grandeur of creation uncontaminated with the putrid petrifactions of creeds that have no right to an existence.

This Tombs Angel was handicapped by her creed, by her belief that a God would specially aid and protect her.

Now what will the world do with special providences, with the special interposition of a God in the affairs of mortals on earth?

In the great fire at Paterson there seems to have been a lesson for those who seek special divine indorsement of their own special religious creed.

There is no doubt that the earnestness attaching to certain religious beliefs at various times of the world's history have done great good.

Men have worked hard, have suffered and died for some particular religion or some particular creed, who would perhaps have been incapable of feeling the same enthusiasm for mere abstract truth.

The lesson which this Paterson fire teaches is this:

The world is ruled by laws, and these laws the world's Ruler never violates. He does not cause the sun to stop in its journey toward Vega or the earth to cease its rolling. He does not interfere with the direction of the lightning's bolt—churches are struck by lightning every week in the summer time. He does not interfere with the course of the flames, which follow laws absolutely definite.

In the Paterson fire there were destroyed five churches, which included Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopal and Roman Catholic churches.

Their destruction was a great loss unquestionably. That loss will be mitigated if it should serve to impress upon men's minds the fact that their own little religious ideas are individual and personal, important enough upon this little earth, but not recognized by the great laws and Lawgiver by which the earth is ruled.

But we will dismiss these thoughts and refer to the last moments of this lovely Tombs Angel. Pinioned, as it were, in her room in this terrible hour, she engaged in solemn prayer. Oh! how divinely tender, sweet and beautiful!

Every word was tremulous with pathetic agony, and went forth as an Angel of Light out of the lurid, hellish flames that surrounded her.

There was the radiance of heaven in her soul as she prayed and prayed.

But the fiendish flames came nearer and nearer, the smoke became more dense and black, the streaks of lurid fire surrounded her, her room became a pandemonium of all that is destructive, until at last this Tombs Angel is suffocated—falls unconscious to the floor, and from that time on is totally oblivious to what occurred—a victim of a belief in the existence of a God who never did and never will respond to a prayer, and who is only a myth of the imagination.

But this Tombs Angel finally awakened in spirit life, surrounded by angels of light and love. It was an awakening transcendentally grand and beautiful—glorious in all respects! The lurid light of an earthly hell had passed away. A pandemonium of the elements had ceased. The terrifying agony of the conflagration no longer confronted her, and she was surrounded with the radiance of heaven.

Law reigns supreme. The whole world is advancing heavenward. All of its present inhabitants will be in that locality within a hundred years. A few—a very few—may live beyond that time. Some will die peacefully and calmly in bed. Others will go by accident. Some will be burned to death. Many will be hung. Suicide will end the existence of untold thousands. Verily, what a motley crowd on earth and much more motley is that of the spirit realms.

When humanity banishes all Gods, all Saviors, all religious mummery, all saints, from their religious belief, and devote themselves to assisting the unfortunate, to relieving poverty of its sordid conditions, then the world will advance to a higher plane, and every truly good mortal will become a assisting to redeem the world from its darkness and misery.

The President concluded his address, receiving the cordial approval and applause of all those present. One of the members then arose and asked the president how much of his address was original, and he replied very pointedly and with a merry twinkle in his eyes, "None of it!" He then quaintly stated that the words could all be found in Webster's Dictionary, and their combination into sentences and paragraphs could be found by the careful student in ancient and current literature. "In fact," he said, "I never had an original idea in my life. I thought I had invented an original joke once, but in the course of a few weeks I was able to trace it back to ancient Greece. Since then I have ceased wholly to consider myself original, and if any members think I ought to be, I will hand in my resignation at once. Any thought of originality on my part will not be tolerated. It saves a great deal of my precious time to bring into requisition Webster's Dictionary and ancient and current literature and news, and able thoughts on the part of others. We do this in order to furnish the Godless and Devilless Club with the cream of the earth. The whole speech word by word, sentence by sentence can be found elsewhere with the exception of the phrase, Godless and Devilless Club—that is original."

This meeting of the Godless and Devilless Club was especially well attended, and the remarks of the President were enthusiastically received. Its main object is to do good, and its members are ever on the alert to do kind acts, thus cheering those in poverty, sickness or distress.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five percent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor current generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes, and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound. Actina has never failed to cure ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advise free, and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, Free. Address New York & London Electric Association, Dep. ..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

Articles of incorporation were filed in the county clerk's office, Louisville, Ky., by the Kentucky State Spiritual Association. The following are the incorporators: Val Speed, John L. Franck, C. Kircher, John C. Oesterich, W. C. Mann, J. H. Wilson, Edgar Bundy, J. S. Cully, E. L. Lentsch, Mrs. Mary Mann, Mrs. Mary Kircher, Mrs. Emma Hazard, Mrs. Elizabeth Miller and Mrs. Teresa Doll. There is no capital stock, the purpose of the incorporation being the accumulation of a fund to erect a church under the foregoing name.

Chas. Peters writes from Port Angeles, Wash.: "I had thought that among the many Spiritualist friends that my wife, Laura E. Peters, had, that some one would write to The Progressive Thinker telling you of her passing into the spirit world, which occurred on January 11. I am informed that she has already controlled a medium at a public meeting in Seattle, and I have no doubt she will be as active as a spirit as she was when on earth life, and try to help mankind out of the thralldom that still encroaches it."

Benjamin York, an old soldier of Monticello, N. Y., has suddenly become famous throughout Sullivan county through the discovery of $6,750. On Jan. 10, Mrs. M. C. Brand of New York, who has a country place near there, lost a gold purse containing $6,750. Mrs. Brand valued the purse at $300 and offered the $6,750 to the person who should find and restore it to her. Yesterday morning Ben York awoke with a start. He had dreamed that at a certain place in Main street, buried under a large snow drift, was Mrs. Brand's lost purse. Armed with a shovel he went to the place and after an hour of hard work he uncovered the pocketbook.

Louise Loebel writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "The Ladies Aid Golden Rule Spiritual Society has made arrangements for a series of Dime Socials, for the benefit of poor and destitute families. Dr. F. L. Mehrtens and wife, of Ripon, Wis., have also given several seances at their home for the benefit of the Aid. The friends at Ripon are deeply interested in this work of love and charity, and assist us with contributions whenever they can. We thank them greatly for their kind thought and assistance."

P. W. Johnson writes: "There is something in Spiritualism that comes right down to date; it is now, not 2,000 or 4,000 years old."

W. J. Elmo writes: "Our meetings were well attended, Dr. Warne as speaker. He says he sees nothing but success for us."

Mabel Calen writes: "Allow me to thank you for your premium, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. Indeed, my husband and self can't thank you enough for the pleasure we have derived from the previous books you so kindly sent us, and are anticipating much pleasure from this one, not to speak of another year's visit from the dear old Progressive Thinker. Though a stranger to you, Mr. Francis, I feel deeply grateful for the happiness which came into my life through your kindness in enabling us to know so much of our future home, and our friends gone before. It is a subject that interests me beyond any thing else, and my books and papers are such a comfort to me."

Seventh Day Adventists are all wrought up and declare that the end of the world is near at hand, firmly believing that the warning has been conveyed to them by the appearance of a black horse on the ruins of Kellogg's Sanitarium at Battle Creek, Mich. Upon the side of a wall, which is still as white as before the fire, has appeared a perfect picture of a black horse burned in the wall. With extended head, open mouth, distended eyes and the ears lying back on the head, the animal presents a fierce appearance. Thousands daily visit the place and speculate on the strange sight. The Adventists, who lay great stress upon Bible signs, have been searching the Bible for a reference to the black horse. They have found just one reference, and that is in the sixth chapter of Revelation. This entire chapter refers to the end of the world and the troubles to come, and ends with this warning: 'For the great day of wrath is come and who shall be able to stand."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"The Cow Pea" is the title of the latest publication issued by the Experiment Farm of the North Carolina State Horticultural Society, at Southern Pines, N. C. Every reader can get a copy free by writing to the Superintendent of Experiment Farm, Southern Pines, N. C.

Do such things as ghost apparitions, visible to human eyes, really exist? Yes, we are convinced they do. While we recognize the fact of their existence, we may not be able to explain their origin. This statement was made today by Professor James H. Hyslop, of Columbia University and Rev. Minot J. Savage, of the Church of the Messiah, who are members of the American Society of Psychical Research. "I think," said Dr. Savage, "that if you were to throw a stone at random in any part of this city you would be almost certain to strike a house in which at least some form of psychical phenomenon has been observed. Perhaps there is only one member of the family who has made these observations, and he may be keeping his thoughts on the subject secret from the other members of his family."

Dr. Savage is convinced that Mrs. Piper is a genuine psychic medium. "I had sittings with her many years before our society is founded, or before it was known to the public. It was through her that I obtained a message from my son, who died about two years ago." Dr. Savage said that during the sittings his son made known his presence through the medium, who was in a trance at the time. Mrs. Piper, he said, had never been acquainted with his son and had never seen him. Professor Hyslop, who is well known for his works on psychology and hypnosis, said: "I am familiar with the remarkable occurrences of which Dr. Savage speaks. I have had sittings with Mrs. Piper, and I know that she does transmit messages in writing of which she is unconscious. Where the messages come from I do not know, but beyond doubt they are genuine."—Record-Herald.

H. A. Budington writes: "The management has engaged the Schubert Quartette of Boston, for the entire season at Lake Pleasant next summer. The thousands of dwellers and visitors at this celebrated camp will be pleased to know that first-class vocal music will be rendered at this place next August."

G. W. Kates writes as follows of missionary work: "We have held meetings in Cincinnati, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; Mt. Vernon, Ill.; Little Rock, Ark.; Marshall, Houston and Galveston, Tex. We have publicly referred to the excellent meetings in Cincinnati, Evansville and Mt. Vernon. At Little Rock we organized and chartered a society for the N. S. A., and at Marshall, Tex., we obtained a society for the Texas State Association. At Houston, we had large meetings and good results. Here they have a good working society with Mrs. Shaffer as their regular speaker, and supplied our meetings with good music by a talented orchestra. Such music always inspires good results. At Galveston we found a well conducted society, with John W. Ring as their regular speaker. They have lately purchased a commodious church and are refitting it and have already a comfortable home. We held the first meeting in the edifice, and have had large audiences. Residents near the Temple contributed $1,500 towards the purchase by the Spiritualists, and that goes to show how respectful is the cause here, made so by a regular work well conducted by a settled speaker. We have high hopes for our cause in this city, which has so grandly been resurrected from the flood that almost destroyed it. The Texas State Association seems to be well officered and is full of zeal. They hope to secure general co-operation of the Lone Star State Spiritualists. Every locality should organize and join in the labor of carrying the truths of life to all people within their borders. John W. Ring, as president of the State Association, is arranging our route and preceding us on the tour. We will be in Texas most of March, and hope to report encouragingly of the co-operative work being done by both the N. S. A. and the Texas State Association."

Before the New York City Training School for Nurses, Prof. John D. Quackenbos, at the New York Academy of Medicine, recently read a paper on "Hypo-Science, Its Progress and Its Future Development." He called attention to the important advance made by psychology by the assumption of a practical character and in part he said: "In no direction has this practical evolution been more conspicuous than in the recent utilization of psycho-therapeutics as an appropriate instrumentality for the treatment of the functional disorders, nervous diseases, delusions and imperative conceptions, moral obliquity and dis-equilibrium, backwardness and arrested mental development. High purpose and noble endeavor have been substituted in character for carnal propensities and sordid aims, worthy ideals for bestial standards, intellectual brilliance and living interest for obtuseness and indifference. Thus, through the transmission of automatic impulses to right doing for a few generations, it is possible by concerted philanthropic effort perceptibly to diminish crime. In educational work the value of suggestion can hardly be overestimated. Not only may dull minds be polished, unbalanced minds adjusted, gifted minds empowered to exploit their talents, but the educating intellect of the school child may tread the royal road to learning which ancient philosophers sought for in vain; the matured mind of the scholar may be clothed with perceptive faculty, with keenest insight, tireless capacity for application, unerring taste, and the imaginative mind of painter, poet, musician, discoverer may be invested with creative efficiency in the line of ideals that are high and true."—Pittsburg Telegraph.

J. R. Alter expresses his views of the Symposium: "In some of the articles in the symposium, there cropped out occasionally a harshness that grated on my sensorium like an intellectual buzz-saw a little out of fix. Permit me to say that I view the short article by Bishop A. Beals as very complete indeed, 'as words fitly chosen.' I hope it will be again read by all. But there is some best in all; some valuable truths."

The Virginia Capitol is infested with spooks, ghosts, spirits. This can be attested by men who were in the building while the suffrage question was being debated. The members of the Democratic conference were being entertained with a speech by one of the most prominent orators of the state, and he was soaring. The members were all attention and there was the best of order in the hall. The speaker paused and there was a solemn silence. "Talk! Talk!" thundered a voice in tones sepulchral and awful. The members turned and looked at each other. The speaker paled, and a search was instituted to see if one of the members had fallen asleep and was muttering. No trace of the disturbing sound was discovered. Chairman Keezell rapped for order, and the constitutionalists began to smile. A search was made of the galleries, it being suggested that some joker had gone up there for the purpose of injecting a little fun into the debates. The investigation failed to locate the presence of any one. Again did the orator essay to enlighten the members. After making a particularly strong point he paused for the remark to have a full effect on the conference. Again a voice cried: "Talk! Talk! Talk!" Members began to have cold shivers, and some expressed a desire to go home. "The sergeant-at-arms will make an investigation and report to the conference forthwith," said the presiding officer in a shaking voice. "All doors locked, sir. Not a trace of anything living up there," was that official's report. —Chicago American.

Dr. W. M. McCain writes from Detroit, Mich.: "Not being a Spiritualist, I was anxious to learn more of its teachings, and attended several meetings at Shane Hall, conducted by Mrs. Nellie Metcalf during the past winter, and who has been compelled to retire for a short time for a rest. There is certainly much in the teachings of this faith, expressed by Mrs. Metcalf, to inspire the respect of all thinking people."

A. L. Coffey writes from Le-Roy, Ill.: "On Dec. 2, 3, 4 and 5, G. H. Brooks, of Wheaton, Ill., delivered four interesting lectures here on Spiritualism, the first ever given in this little city. His lectures were followed with psychometric readings. In the month of February, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago, gave us three soul-inspiring lectures, putting forth our beautiful philosophy in a masterly way. Her lectures were also followed by spirit messages, proving to many beyond a doubt the truth of spirit return. The work of these two earnest workers has caused quite a stir in our little town, and we hope in the near future to have them with us again. We have no organization here as yet, but through the generosity of a few we hope to erect a $4,000 temple this coming summer. Those who can, please send us plans, cuts or any information that may help us in the erection of our temple."

Arden Dearbeyne, an Armenian, who has been in Battle Creek, Mich., for several months, possesses strange occult powers which are puzzling the investigators of psychic phenomena. That which attracted attention to this Asiatic mystic was the fact that at a public meeting during the holiday time in one of his visions he described a calamity which was to befall this city by the destruction of a great public building. Since the verification of this vision by the burning of the sanitarium, more speculation has been aroused regarding the occult powers of this man. Dearbeyne was born in Smyrna. From youth he possessed psychic powers. He seemed by this power commanded to come to this country. He found his way to Battle Creek and has become a member of the Christopathian brotherhood, a new sect organized in this city about one year ago. Dearbeyne is not a Spiritualist, and does not claim to be influenced by disembodied spirits. His powers are those inherent and latent in every human being—the psychic, which if developed will bring wonderful results to mankind. He claims the power of "soul flight," and can visit his old home in Asia and see what his friends are doing. He also claims to visit Mars and the other planets, and tells of the people, and what they are doing in the other worlds. People who have had sittings with him have had him visit the home of friends at a distance and relate what was transpiring at the time. It is claimed that what he related was afterwards verified by corresponding with those friends and finding out what they were doing at that particular time. "Soul flight" is the principal phenomenon connected with his occult powers. During his sittings he remains in his normal state, simply closing his eyes and placing himself in a state of repose. —Detroit News.

J. D. G. writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "There is considerable interest manifested here in the cause of Spiritualism. The two principal societies are flourishing. The Truth Seekers, under the presidency of Mrs. O. C. Knox, is holding large meetings at 11 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. Having no regular lecturer this society is frequently treated to good itinerant talent sojourning in this city during the winter season. The late Wm. Enspenmuller bequeathed to this society and to the Harmonial Society, the sum of $300 each. The veteran Prof. Loveland is now in the city, and is delivering a course of lectures on Modern Spiritualism, one lecture every Sunday afternoon at Lincoln Hall. Last evening he delivered a lecture on Socialism before the Socialists of Los Angeles in Woodman's Hall, to a large audience. Mrs. Edith Nickless-Cobb has been holding meetings at Brent's Hall and receiving good support. A mediums' meeting is held every Sunday at the large parlors of Mrs. Koecher; lectures under spirit control by Mrs. Mae Hunt; Mrs. Foster, a young medium of great promise; Professors Loveland and McLain speak also at this place. Mrs. Gilliland-Howe and husband, of Boston, who remained in Los Angeles after the Southern California camp-meeting, have been holding meetings every Sunday afternoon at Lincoln Hall, but they are now doing missionary work in Passadena, a suburban city eight miles north of Los Angeles. The largest society in the city, if not in the state, the Harmonial Association, is doing finely under the efficient board of trustees of business men, and the brilliant mediumship of Mrs. Maude L. von Freitag. This society is contemplating building a temple and have started a fund for that purpose, quietly and unostentatiously, and have set a high mark before them for the coming year to increase its membership to one thousand. 'Low aim, not failure, is a crime.' Board of trustees, President, W. J. Williams; vice-president Louis LaGoill; secretary, J. D. Griffith; treasurer, Mrs. Essie A. Ashby; trustees, Hamilton C. O'Bleness, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, G. H. Ashby and George McNeil. During the last year this association and its auxiliaries raised $3,620.01; expenses, $3,135.93. Cash on hand, $492.08. This is independent of the temple fund and subscriptions made. We begin to feel in Los Angeles that this city is to be the 'Hub' of Spiritualism in a very short time."

The Philadelphia (Pa.) Spiritualist Society gave a package party on Friday evening, Feb. 28. The vice-president, Mr. Sam'l Wheeler, assumed the office of auctioneer, and his racy remarks and genial 'bid-ableness' contributed greatly to the fun of the occasion. After the auction a short address was given by the well-known speaker, Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood, who had just arrived in the city, and who is to deliver a course of lectures during the month of March. His address was well received. Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn, another eminent speaker, whose lecture course has just closed, gave several readings which were rendered beautifully. Not the least of them was a poem on our Civil War, in which Mr. Wheeler impersonated a worn and weary veteran of '61. Mrs. Allyn rendered the stanzas with much feeling, introducing in their appropriate places many of the old war songs, which were sung with stirring effect by choir and audience. The Lyceum also bore their share of the evening's entertainment, for which thanks are due Mrs. Allyn, who is an indefatigable worker. The Goddess of Liberty, one of the older girls, and the different younger children formed a moving tableau which made a very pleasing exhibition. 'Old Glory' was there in abundance, and everything and everybody was decorated with the red, white and blue."

Mrs. Amanda Coffman writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "I am at home again after a pleasant and successful engagement of three months—December and January with the good people of Indianapolis, Ind., and the month of February for the Independent church at Alliance, Ohio. The Indianapolis society is a strong one. Its officers are men and women of good business ability and spiritually unfolded. My stay was made doubly pleasant. I was fortunate enough to be located next door to the church and enjoyed the genial hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Duvall. When ill they cared for me as if one of their own family. Human language is so incapable of expressing the soul's gratitude for these kind acts. From Indianapolis I went to Alliance, Ohio. The society is a small one, but alive and working for the cause of Spiritualism. It was my pleasure to be entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Tiffany. They know how to make conditions for the sensitives that fall in their hands. Mrs. Tiffany is one of the finest psychics it has been my pleasure to meet. There was not a day while in her home that the loved ones did not manifest by opening and shutting doors, moving articles, rapping, etc. one day while we were visiting we heard a shower of raps on the ceiling, and they kept it up until Mrs. Tiffany was impressed to go up stairs, and there found that the stove was red hot, and half way up the pipe. In a short time the house would have been in flames. We are happy in the knowledge that we are watched over by loving ones from the spirit side of life. I arrived home the 24th, and it does seem good to be there once more to meet old friends. To-morrow I labor for the home society. The society here is in a flourishing condition owing to the excellent work of Dr. Lamar and D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, O. I will labor for the Jackson Society the last three Sundays of March."

Mrs. B. M. Kindle gives some of her experiences in investigating Spiritualism: "We began investigating Spiritualism in 1879, at Indianapolis, by attending a lecture by Frank T. Ripley. We were so well pleased with his lecture and tests that in a short time we investigated slate-writing. We are perfectly satisfied that spirit return is true. We then got O. E. Winans, of Edinburg, Ind., to come to our house and give a seance in 1894. They are grand. At one seance given by him later my twin sister, who passed out when a year old, surprised us by materializing in our parlor. She spoke to me and told me she often comes and sings for me. My Indian control, Minnie, materialized and stood out in the parlor several minutes. We sit with several others in our home for development. In four months I developed clairaudient singing; it is a phase that very few develop. The music is grand. I devote an hour every night to singing with my little angel band. When I awake in the night or when morning comes, I hear their sweet singing around my bed."

A. A. McCormick writes: "The Progressive Thinker is a grand and great paper. Well, Mr. Editor, keep up your Home Circle in the paper. I think it is a grand thing. George W. Kates and wife will be in Hillsboro, Texas, March 17, and we are going to try to make everything as bright for them as possible while here. Of course we are all a little bit mossy. We are all more or less ashamed to get out and fight for our cause publicly, as we ought to."

Dr. J. L. York, prominent as a worker in the fields of reform, writes as follows of the death of Mrs. Laura E. Peters, at Port Angeles, Washington: "We received with sadness the news of Laura E. Peters' passing away, and yet, knowing how long she has suffered we cannot mourn her release from life in which she could no longer find comfort and usefulness. She was a good soul and a sincere and brave worker in the cause of truth, and ever ready to lend a hand in the noble work of the emancipation of mankind from the bondage of ignorance and superstition. I write these lines from a long and happy personal experience and acquaintance with her in all of my early work in Seattle, and will never forget her friendship and kindness to me in my work during all those years, when we battled together for mental liberty, and from first to last she has maintained those sterling elements of character which made her above the average in intellect and a true wife, mother and devoted friend. Let her rest. Cover her grave with flowers, and I only wished that I possessed her abiding faith in conscious life beyond the grave, and can heartily endorse the statement of her bereft husband: 'The world has been a bit brighter and better for her having lived in it.' All I have said of her I trust may be said of me when the measure of life is full and my work is done, and then I shall be content. So it is, one by one the ties of earth are severed, and like withered leaves we fall to the bosom of Mother Earth, and if only to rest and sleep it is well. But if to take up life on a higher plane and meet and know and love those we knew on earth, it is better, and in either case I am sure that infinite nature will do all things well. In her I trust."

G. H. Brooks writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "The Unity Spiritual Society, which meets in the Ethical Building, 558 Jefferson street, will celebrate the anniversary. It will give a dancing party in the hall Saturday evening; then hold two services, Sunday afternoon at three o'clock, and evening at half past seven. It is hoped there will be a goodly attendance from adjoining places. A very large cinch party was held at the residence of Henry Smith, 770 Booth street, Wednesday evening. The society is gay with different kinds of entertainments and socials. A musicale will be held at Henry Smith's, on the 19th."

Henry H. Warner may be addressed at Hotel Columbia, Denver, Colo., and he would like engagements in vicinity.

Marguerite St. Omer Briggs is said to be doing a grand work for the Society of Spiritual Unity, Detroit, Mich. She can be secured as speaker and test medium for coming camp season. Her address is No. 100 Clifford street. The society will hold anniversary services, March 23. Mrs. Jenkins and others will assist.

R. D. Morrison, M. D., writes: "I have been taking spiritual papers and journals for thirty years, and I want to tell you that The Progressive Thinker is decidedly the best. I don't know how I could live through the weeks without it, and just think we get it for one dollar per year, and eight beautiful premium books for almost nothing. I don't understand, Brother Francis, how you can afford to do it."

Dr. Louis H. Freedman, 3036 Indiana avenue, informs us that Dr. Harrison Hipp lately performed a successful surgical operation on his neck. He was under the influence of ether two and a half hours. The Doctor hopes to be about soon, and able to tend to his patients. We are glad to learn that he passed through the trying ordeal safely.

L. de Forrest writes: "The Band of Harmony will hold its annual Experience Meeting at its rooms, 608 Handel Handel Hall, 40 Randolph street, Thursday evening, March 20. Each member will earn a dollar, bring it and relate how it was earned, and how much pleasure it gives to contribute the mite to so worthy a cause. No limitation is placed upon the amounts over one dollar. Come everybody and have a good time. Any friends can have the same privilege. Afternoon session at 3 o'clock."

Mrs. Maggie Waite, the well-known platform test medium, is now located at No. 3116 Wabash avenue, Chicago. She can be reached by telephone, "Phone Green 724." She can be consulted daily. Mrs. Waite intends, we are glad to learn, to remain in the city for some time.

Stephen Gardner writes: "Rural mail carrier has to-day delivered our three premium books. We now have the eight books—a splendid library, for which we feel very thankful. The Progressive Thinker is always a welcome guest. I am nearing 84, and so long as I am here, you may count on me as a subscriber."

The Michigan State Spiritual Association will hold a mass convntion, in Longwell's Opera House, Paw Paw, Mich., March 28, 29 and 30, 1902. Laura Mattlock, secretary, Owosso, Mich.

Carrie Eloise Holmes writes from Sullivan, Ind.: "Our Psychical Research Society has had the services of Mrs. Jackson, the psychometrist, clairvoyant and clairaudient medium, whose home is in Grand Rapids, Mich. She has been with us a week. Every test has been absolutely perfect. She will remain with us a week or so longer and is open to engagements. Address her here."

Columbus Wells writes: "I heartily thank you for the premium book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. It is a very interesting and instructive work. It puts a man in mind to make good and high resolves and then live up to them."

Mrs. Dr. Edwards has returned to Chicago, and is located at 544 North Clark street.

C. F. Van Luven writes: "The Oakland (Cal.) Spiritualist Temple Association will celebrate the Fifty-fourth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, at Woodman Hall, 521 Twelfth street, March 30, at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m. Chas. J. Anderson, the eloquent boy orator, and other prominent workers will take part in the exercises. There will be a grand banquet at 5 p. m. There will be recitations and solos rendered by local talent. Special music by the Ideal Mandolin and Guitar Orchestra, under the leadership of Prof. C. Pedersen. All are cordially invited to attend. Seats free."

To the Spiritualists of New York.

Dear Brethren:—Vigilance is the price of liberty. I have been out of the state since January, and have been very busy, and, perhaps, not as watchful as was my duty. The doctors have forced a vaccination bill through our State Senate. We are now all to be considered criminals and suffer the penalties of the law unless we allow some doctor to inject poison into our veins.

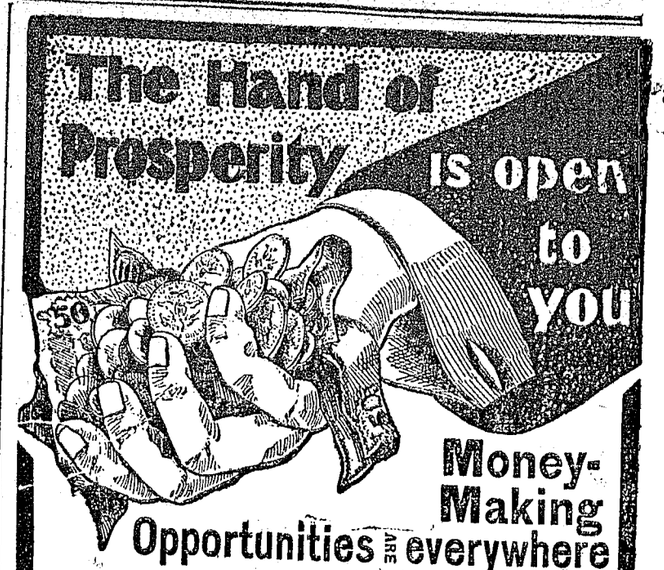
We have no objections to those being vaccinated who wish it; but in no case should we who are conscientiously opposed to it be compelled to submit to any such act of tyranny. The best place to fight this matter is in the legislature.

If vaccination is a preventive of small-pox, why should we, who prefer even small-pox to the greater evils which sometimes accompany vaccination be compelled to submit to it? If small-pox is not catching among the vaccinated, why not allow those who prefer it to vaccination have it to their heart's content. It can harm no others. Where is the danger?

If, on the other hand, vaccination does not prevent small-pox, then why should we be compelled to submit to it? In any case let us now present a solid front against it. We may be able to kill the bill in the assembly, or even with the governor, after the assembly shall have passed it.

What shall we do? I have written for a hearing before the assembly committee on the question. I have also written Dr. Sellen, the vice-president of the New York Anti-Vaccination Association, to gather the Anti-vaccination forces, to meet the M. Ds. before this committee.

I to-day write the president of the N. S. A. to be on hand and in the name of the N. S. A. assist in making this fight. I am also appealing to the officers of the N. S. A. to assist in this work. I shall be present at the hearing if we get one.



Now, let every Spiritualist, and every anti-vaccinationist write their assemblyman to fight this bill. They must know that we are alive and mean business.

Let every one who can, contribute from one to fifty dollars to assist in this work. Send your contributions to H. A. Richardson, treasurer of the N. Y. A. of S. Address him at East Aurora, N. Y. If we fail to get the desired hearing, the means can be expended in other good work in this state.

Address me until April 1, at 715 12th street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Yours to try to save something of what there is left of our liberties.

MOSES HULL.

Money-Making Opportunities are everywhere

There is no reason why the year 1902 should not be the most prosperous you have ever known. If you cannot see these opportunities train your mind to do so. Riches and fame come only to those who can influence and control the minds of their fellow men. Every self-made wealthy man is a living proof of this fact. You have but one brain, one pair of hands; you cannot do everything, but you can in your own home learn in an incredibly short time how to influence, control and direct the brains and hands of other people so as to put money into your pocket. You can bend their wills and make them do your bidding. You can learn the science of success, and pass your competitors in business, in social life, in politics or in any other direction you choose. You can charm and fascinate people with an irresistible power and hold their love and friendship always. You can command success in all you undertake.

You need a knowledge of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism to attain this result. These sciences are the very life blood of business and social success.

Valuable Secrets Free

The American College of Sciences, of Philadelphia, has in response to a popular demand issued a handsomely illustrated book, which clearly explains the secrets of the wonder science of the age. Twenty different authors of world-wide renown have contributed to it. A number of different methods are described which any intelligent man or woman can follow and materially better his or her condition in life. The secret of the money-making power of Carnegie, Morgan, Rockefeller and the Vanderbilts is made plain. The book tells how you can use Hypnotism to cure diseases and bad habits; how to make this grand science a potent factor in your life. It is full of intensely interesting and practical information. It is heartily endorsed by the most prominent doctors, lawyers, clergymen and financiers of this country. It has been issued at great expense, but to each interested person a copy will be sent postpaid for a limited time. If you want to acquire a wonderful power of personal influence; if you wish to rise higher in your accepted business or calling; if you wish to become a veritable leader of men—a man of mark in your community, send your name and address for a copy of this remarkable book which reveals to you the inner mysteries of the most marvelous mind and soul power known to man.

Capt. C. F. Strong of Dryden, N. Y., says: "Every sentence in your grand work is a gem; every thought divine; money could not buy the knowledge I have gained."

GOOD WORK IN BUFFALO.

The Spiritual Bazaar of the First Church.

The First Spiritual Church of Buffalo, of which Rev. Moses Hull is pastor, is doing a good work for the cause of Spiritualism, including its humanitarian efforts and general reforms. Just now Mrs. Atcheson is serving in place of the pastor, and drawing large houses, and adding memberships.

I am glad to know this, for I regard her as an honest medium and worthy woman. Moses scatters himself over too much territory to hold the fort alone in Buffalo. Mrs. Matteson, the clairvoyant doctor, has done a splendid work for the cause and for the sick as well; and but for her the First Spiritual Church of Buffalo would probably never have been. Her energy, business tact, influence with business men, and her money made it possible.

Her daughter, Mrs. Nellie Whitcomb, is an active worker for the bazaar which is to be held the last week of March; and she will appreciate any help from friends or other societies, and I think I may safely say that she and her co-workers in Buffalo will be liberal in reciprocating favors from other societies. This is a good way to extend acquaintances, and enlarge social spheres, and thus mutually benefit.

Any society that feels an interest in the good work may do itself credit and enjoy a real benefit by making up a package of donations in money or any salable article, from a fan, a five-cent handkerchief, a book, a necktie, a painting, to a watch or a $10 note. Any amount, large or small, will be appreciated and used for the benefit of the bazaar and the cause. Address all donations for this "Independent Spiritual Booth" to Mrs. Nellie Whitcomb, 248 N. Division street, Buffalo, N. Y.

I am informed that the society is trying to get ready to enlarge its Temple—or church—as there is not room for the growing audiences, and this fair is to help in this laudable effort. This is a good report, for those who think Spiritualism is on the decline.

Let us realize that the cause is ours wherever it may be represented, and help all we can to advance the good work. LYMAN C. HOWE.

THANK GOD! I CAN SEE AGAIN.

A. J. Palmer, After Being Totally Blind, is Cured at Home by Dr. Coffee.

A. J. Palmer of Melrose, Iowa, tells all about his eye trouble and his cure, so anyone can understand it in Dr. W. O. Coffee's 80 page book, "The New System of Treating Diseases of the Eye." This case and dozens of others, illustrated with colored cuts, showing exact trouble. Valuable information, interesting reading and free if you describe your case or some friend's.

A. J. PALMER

Read His Statement.

"The first I noticed anything wrong with my eyes was in December 1898. They commenced to matter and the lids stuck together and got a little sore and inflamed, and this lasted for a month or two. Each week they got worse until they got to be painful; sharp, neuralgic pains went through them at all times during the day and at night; then ulcers came on the sight which made me blind very rapidly, but it was in July, 1900, when I got totally blind, and I suffered with the most terrible inflammation and ulcers on the sight, and scums over the sight that a person could suffer. After I had doctored with several other doctors, I got no relief, I wrote to Dr. Coffee and put myself under his treatment. He doctored my eyes with mild medicines that soothed them, and stopped the pain in three days. My sight commenced to improve, and ulcers that had been there for a year, commenced to heal, and in three weeks I could see to read large print, and in three months time my eyes were perfectly well. I thank God I can see again. He used no blue stone nor caustic or any strong medicine, and I want to say to anyone who is afflicted with inflammation or weak eyes, that I think his Absorption Treatment is the most wonderful thing in the world, and you should write him immediately."

Dr. Coffee is the originator of the Absorption Treatment which cures you at home without any operation, and at small cost, of cataracts, granulated lids, scums, films, sore, weak or watery eyes or failing sight, complete paralysis of optic nerve only, excepted. Write today for this veritable eye encyclopedia which may show you or some friend the way to light. Address

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Bear in mind, please, that Isa Wilson Kayner's address is at No. 112 Winchester avenue, Chicago, where she can be addressed.

Articles of incorporation were filed in the county clerk's office, Louisville, Ky., by the Kentucky State Spiritual Association. The following are the incorporators: Val Speed, John L. Franck, C. Kircher, John C. Oesterich, W. C. Mann, J. H. Wilson, Edgar Bundy, J. S. Cully, E. L. Lentsch, Mrs. Mary Mann, Mrs. Mary Kircher, Mrs. Emma Hazard, Mrs. Elizabeth Miller and Mrs. Teresa Doll. There is no capital stock, the purpose of the incorporation being the accumulation of a fund to erect a church under the foregoing name.

Chas. Peters writes from Port Angeles, Wash.: "I had thought that among the many Spiritualist friends that my wife, Laura E. Peters, had, that some one would write to The Progressive Thinker telling you of her passing into the spirit world, which occurred on January 11. I am informed that she has already controlled a medium at a public meeting in Seattle, and I have no doubt she will be as active as a spirit as she was when on earth life, and try to help mankind out of the thralldom that still encroaches it."

Benjamin York, an old soldier of Monticello, N. Y., has suddenly become famous throughout Sullivan county through the discovery of $6,750. On Jan. 10, Mrs. M. C. Brand of New York, who has a country place near there, lost a gold purse containing $6,750. Mrs. Brand valued the purse at $300 and offered the $6,750 to the person who should find and restore it to her. Yesterday morning Ben York awoke with a start. He had dreamed that at a certain place in Main street, buried under a large snow drift, was Mrs. Brand's lost purse. Armed with a shovel he went to the place and after an hour of hard work he uncovered the pocketbook.

Louise Loebel writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "The Ladies Aid Golden Rule Spiritual Society has made arrangements for a series of Dime Socials, for the benefit of poor and destitute families. Dr. F. L. Mehrtens and wife, of Ripon, Wis., have also given several seances at their home for the benefit of the Aid. The friends at Ripon are deeply interested in this work of love and charity, and assist us with contributions whenever they can. We thank them greatly for their kind thought and assistance."

P. W. Johnson writes: "There is something in Spiritualism that comes right down to date; it is now, not 2,000 or 4,000 years old."

W. J. Elmo writes: "Our meetings were well attended, Dr. Warne as speaker. He says he sees nothing but success for us."

Mabel Calen writes: "Allow me to thank you for your premium, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. Indeed, my husband and self can't thank you enough for the pleasure we have derived from the previous books you so kindly sent us, and are anticipating much pleasure from this one, not to speak of another year's visit from the dear old Progressive Thinker. Though a stranger to you, Mr. Francis, I feel deeply grateful for the happiness which came into my life through your kindness in enabling us to know so much of our future home, and our friends gone before. It is a subject that interests me beyond any thing else, and my books and papers are such a comfort to me."

Seventh Day Adventists are all wrought up and declare that the end of the world is near at hand, firmly believing that the warning has been conveyed to them by the appearance of a black horse on the ruins of Kellogg's Sanitarium at Battle Creek, Mich. Upon the side of a wall, which is still as white as before the fire, has appeared a perfect picture of a black horse burned in the wall. With extended head, open mouth, distended eyes and the ears lying back on the head, the animal presents a fierce appearance. Thousands daily visit the place and speculate on the strange sight. The Adventists, who lay great stress upon Bible signs, have been searching the Bible for a reference to the black horse. They have found just one reference, and that is in the sixth chapter of Revelation. This entire chapter refers to the end of the world and the troubles to come, and ends with this warning: 'For the great day of wrath is come and who shall be able to stand."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"The Cow Pea" is the title of the latest publication issued by the Experiment Farm of the North Carolina State Horticultural Society, at Southern Pines, N. C. This book neatly bound and illustrated, in plain and concise manner discusses the value and uses of this important crop, the Cow Pea. Every reader can get a copy free by writing to the Superintendent of Experiment Farm, Southern Pines, N. C.

Do such things as ghost apparitions, visible to human eyes, really exist? Yes, we are convinced they do. While we recognize the fact of their existence, we may not be able to explain their origin. This statement was made today by Professor James H. Hyslop, of Columbia University and Rev. Minot J. Savage, of the Church of the Messiah, who are members of the American Society of Psychical Research. "I think," said Dr. Savage, "that if you were to throw a stone at random in any part of this city you would be almost certain to strike a house in which at least some form of psychical phenomenon has been observed. Perhaps there is only one member of the family who has made these observations, and he may be keeping his thoughts on the subject secret from the other members of his family."

Dr. Savage is convinced that Mrs. Piper is a genuine psychic medium. "I had sittings with her many years before our society is founded, or before it was known to the public. It was through her that I obtained a message from my son, who died about two years ago." Dr. Savage said that during the sittings his son made known his presence through the medium, who was in a trance at the time. Mrs. Piper, he said, had never been acquainted with his son and had never seen him. Professor Hyslop, who is well known for his works on psychology and hypnosis, said: "I am familiar with the remarkable occurrences of which Dr. Savage speaks. I have had sittings with Mrs. Piper, and I know that she does transmit messages in writing of which she is unconscious. Where the messages come from I do not know, but beyond doubt they are genuine."—Record-Herald.

H. A. Budington writes: "The management has engaged the Schubert Quartette of Boston, for the entire season at Lake Pleasant next summer. The thousands of dwellers and visitors at this celebrated camp will be pleased to know that first-class vocal music will be rendered at this place next August."

G. W. Kates writes as follows of missionary work: "We have held meetings in Cincinnati, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; Mt. Vernon, Ill.; Little Rock, Ark.; Marshall, Houston and Galveston, Tex. We have publicly referred to the excellent meetings in Cincinnati, Evansville and Mt. Vernon. At Little Rock we organized and chartered a society for the N. S. A., and at Marshall, Tex., we obtained a society for the Texas State Association. At Houston, we had large meetings and good results. Here they have a good working society with Mrs. Shaffer as their regular speaker, and supplied our meetings with good music by a talented orchestra. Such music always inspires good results. At Galveston we found a well conducted society, with John W. Ring as their regular speaker. They have lately purchased a commodious church and are refitting it and have already a comfortable home. We held the first meeting in the edifice, and have had large audiences. Residents near the Temple contributed $1,500 towards the purchase by the Spiritualists, and that goes to show how respectful is the cause here, made so by a regular work well conducted by a settled speaker. We have high hopes for our cause in this city, which has so grandly been resurrected from the flood that almost destroyed it. The Texas State Association seems to be well officered and is full of zeal. They hope to secure general co-operation of the Lone Star State Spiritualists. Every locality should organize and join in the labor of carrying the truths of life to all people within their borders. John W. Ring, as president of the State Association, is arranging our route and preceding us on the tour. We will be in Texas most of March, and hope to report encouraghgly of the co-operative work being done by both the N. S. A. and the Texas State Association."

Before the New York City Training School for Nurses, Prof. John D. Quackenbos, at the New York Academy of Medicine, recently read a paper on "Hypo-Science, Its Progress and Its Future Development." He called attention to the important advance made by psychology by the assumption of a practical character and in part he said: "In no direction has this practical evolution been more conspicuous than in the recent utilization of psycho-therapeutics as an appropriate instrumentality for the treatment of the functional disorders, nervous diseases, delusions and imperative conceptions, moral obliquity and dis-equilibrium, backwardness and arrested mental development. High purpose and noble endeavor have been substituted in character for carnal propensities and sordid aims, worthy ideals for bestial standards, intellectual brilliance and living interest for obtuseness and indifference. Thus, through the transmission of automatic impulses to right doing for a few generations, it is possible by concerted philanthropic effort perceptibly to diminish crime. In educational work the value of suggestion can hardly be overestimated. Not only may dull minds be polished, unbalanced minds adjusted, gifted minds empowered to exploit their talents, but the educating intellect of the school child may tread the royal road to learning which ancient philosophers sought for in vain; the matured mind of the scholar may be clothed with perceptive faculty, with keenest insight, tireless capacity for application, unerring taste, and the imaginative mind of painter, poet, musician, discoverer may be invested with creative efficiency in the line of ideals that are high and true."—Pittsburg Telegraph.

J. R. Alter expresses his views of the Symposium: "In some of the articles in the symposium, there cropped out occasionally a harshness that grated on my sensorium like an intellectual buzzsaw a little out of fix. Permit me to say that I view the short article by Bishop A. Beals as very complete indeed, 'as words fitly chosen.' I hope it will be again read by all. But there is some best in all; some valuable truths."

The Virginia Capitol is infested with spooks, ghosts, spirits. This can be attested by men who were in the building while the suffrage question was being debated. The members of the Democratic conference were being entertained with a speech by one of the most prominent orators of the state, and he was soaring. The members were all attention and there was the best of order in the hall. The speaker paused and there was a solemn silence. "Talk! Talk! Talk!" thundered a voice in tones sepulchral and awful. The members turned and looked at each other. The speaker paled, and a search was instituted to see if one of the members had fallen asleep and was muttering. No trace of the disturbing sound was discovered. Chairman Keezell rapped for order, and the constitutionalists began to smile. A search was made of the galleries, it being suggested that some joker had gone up there for the purpose of injecting a little fun into the debates. The investigation failed to locate the presence of any one. Again did the orator essay to enlighten the members. After making a particularly strong point he paused for the remark to have a full effect on the conference. Again a voice cried: "Talk! Talk! Talk!" Members began to have cold shivers, and some expressed a desire to go home. "The sergeant-at-arms will make an investigation and report to the conference forthwith," said the presiding officer in a shaking voice. "All doors locked, sir. Not a trace of anything living up there," was that official's report. —Chicago American.

Dr. W. M. McCain writes from Detroit, Mich.: "Not being a Spiritualist, I was anxious to learn more of its teachings, and attended several meetings at Shane Hall, conducted by Mrs. Nellie Metcalf during the past winter, and who has been compelled to retire for a short time for a rest. There is certainly much in the teachings of this faith, expressed by Mrs. Metcalf, to inspire the respect of all thinking people."

A. L. Coffey writes from Le-Roy, Ill.: "On Dec. 2, 3, 4 and 5, G. H. Brooks, of Wheaton, Ill., delivered four interesting lectures here on Spiritualism, the first ever given in this little city. His lectures were followed with psychometric readings. In the month of February, Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, of Chicago, gave us three soul-inspiring lectures, putting forth our beautiful philosophy in a masterly way. Her lectures were also followed by spirit messages, proving to many beyond a doubt the truth of spirit return. The work of these two earnest workers has caused quite a stir in our little town, and we hope in the near future to have them with us again. We have no organization here as yet, but through the generosity of a few we hope to erect a $4,000 temple this coming summer. Those who can, please send us plans, cuts or any information that may help us in the erection of our temple."

Arden Dearbeyne, an Armenian, who has been in Battle Creek, Mich., for several months, possesses strange occult powers which are puzzling the investigators of psychic phenomena. That which attracted attention to this Asiatic mystic was the fact that at a public meeting during the holiday time in one of his visions he described a calamity which was to befall this city by the destruction of a great public building. Since the verification of this vision by the burning of the sanitarium, more speculation has been aroused regarding the occult powers of this man. Dearbeyne was born in Smyrna. From youth he possessed psychic powers. He seemed by this power commanded to come to this country. He found his way to Battle Creek and has become a member of the Christopathian brotherhood, a new sect organized in this city about one year ago. Dearbeyne is not a Spiritualist, and does not claim to be influenced by disembodied spirits. His powers are those inherent and latent in every human being—the psychic, which if developed will bring wonderful results to mankind. He claims the power of "soul flight," and can visit his old home in Asia and see what his friends are doing. He also claims to visit Mars and the other planets, and tells of the people, and what they are doing in the other worlds. People who have had sittings with him have had him visit the home of friends at a distance and relate what was transpiring at the time. It is claimed that what he related was afterwards verified by corresponding with those friends and finding out what they were doing at that particular time. "Soul flight" is the principal phenomenon connected with his occult powers. During his sittings he remains in his normal state, simply closing his eyes and placing himself in a state of repose. —Detroit News.

J. D. G. writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "There is considerable interest manifested here in the cause of Spiritualism. The two principal societies are flourishing. The Truth Seekers, under the presidency of Mrs. O. C. Knox, is holding large meetings at 11 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. Having no regular lecturer this society is frequently treated to good itinerant talent sojourning in this city during the winter season. The late Wm. Enspenmuller bequeathed to this society and to the Harmonial Society, the sum of $300 each. The veteran Prof. Loveland is now in the city, and is delivering a course of lectures on Modern Spiritualism, one lecture every Sunday afternoon at Lincoln Hall. Last evening he delivered a lecture on Socialism before the Socialists of Los Angeles in Woodman's Hall, to a large audience. Mrs. Edith Nickless-Cobb has been holding meetings at Brent's Hall and receiving good support. A mediums' meeting is held every Sunday at the large parlors of Mrs. Kercher; lectures under spirit control by Mrs. Mae Hunt; Mrs. Foster, a young medium of great promise; Professors Loveland and McLain speak also at this place. Mrs. Gilliland-Howe and husband, of Boston, who remained in Los Angeles after the Southern California camp-meeting, have been holding meetings every Sunday afternoon at Lincoln Hall, but they are now doing missionary work in Passadena, a suburban city eight miles north of Los Angeles. The largest society in the city, if not in the state, the Harmonial Association, is doing finely under the efficient board of trustees of business men, and the brilliant mediumship of Mrs. Maude L. von Freitag. This society is contemplating building a temple and have started a fund for that purpose, quietly and unostentatiously, and have set a high mark before them for the coming year to increase its membership to one thousand. 'Low aim, not failure, is a crime.' Board of trustees, President, W. J. Williams; vice-president Louis LaGoill; secretary, J. D. Griffith; treasurer, Mrs. Essie A. Ashby; trustees, Hamilton C. O'Bleness, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Adams, G. H. Ashby and George McNeil. During the last year this association and its auxiliaries raised $3,029.01; expenses, $3,135.93. Cash on hand, $492.08. This is independent of the temple fund and subscriptions made. We begin to feel in Los Angeles that this city is to be the 'Hub' of Spiritualism in a very short time."

The Philadelphia (Pa.) Spiritualist Society gave a package party on Friday evening, Feb. 28. The vice-president, Mr. Sam'l Wheeler, assumed the office of auctioneer, and his racy remarks and genial 'bid-ableness' contributed greatly to the fun of the occasion. After the auction a short address was given by the well-known speaker, Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood, who had just arrived in the city, and who is to deliver a course of lectures during the month of March. His address was well received. Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn, another eminent speaker, whose lecture course has just closed, gave several readings which were rendered beautifully. Not the least of them was a poem on our Civil War, in which Mr. Wheeler impersonated a worn and weary veteran of '61. Mrs. Allyn rendered the stanzas with much feeling, introducing in their appropriate places many of the old war songs, which were sung with stirring effect by choir and audience. The Lyceum also bore their share of the evening's entertainment, for which thanks are due Mrs. Allyn, who is an indefatigable worker. The Goddess of Liberty, one of the older girls, and the different younger children formed a moving tableau which made a very pleasing exhibition. 'Old Glory' was there in abundance, and everything and everybody was decorated with the red, white and blue."

Mrs. Amanda Coffman writes from Grand Rapids, Mich.: "I am at home again after a pleasant and successful engagement of three months—December and January with the good people of Indianapolis, Ind., and the month of February for the Independent church at Alliance, Ohio. The Indianapolis society is a strong one. Its officers are men and women of good business ability and spiritually unfolded. My stay was made doubly pleasant. I was fortunate enough to be located next door to the church and enjoyed the genial hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Duvall. When ill they cared for me as if one of their own family. Human language is so incapable of expressing the soul's gratitude for these kind acts. From Indianapolis I went to Alliance, Ohio. The society is a small one, but alive and working for the cause of Spiritualism. It was my pleasure to be entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Tiffany. They know how to make conditions for the sensitives that fall in their hands. Mrs. Tiffany is one of the finest psychics it has been my pleasure to meet. There was not a day while in her home that the loved ones did not manifest by opening and shutting doors, moving articles, rapping, etc. one day while we were visiting we heard a shower of raps on the ceiling, and they kept it up until Mrs. Tiffany was impressed to go up stairs, and there found that the stove was red hot, and half way up the pipe. In a short time the house would have been in flames. We are happy in the knowledge that we are watched over by loving ones from the spirit side of life. I arrived home the 24th, and it does seem good to be there once more to meet old friends. To-morrow I labor for the home society. The society here is in a flourishing condition owing to the excellent work of Dr. Lamar and D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, O. I will labor for the Jackson Society the last three Sundays of March."

Mrs. B. M. Kindle gives some of her experiences in investigating Spiritualism: "We began investigating Spiritualism in 1879, at Indianapolis, by attending a lecture by Frank T. Ripley. We were so well pleased with his lecture and tests that in a short time we investigated slate-writing. We are perfectly satisfied that spirit return is true. We then got C. E. Winans, of Edinburg, Ind., to come to our house and give a seance in 1894. They are grand. At one seance given by him later my twin sister, who passed out when a year old, surprised us by materializing in our parlor. She spoke to me and told me she often comes and sings for me. My Indian control, Minnie, materialized and stood out in the parlor several minutes. We sit with several others in our home for development. In four months I developed clairaudient singing; it is a phase that very few develop. The music is grand. I devote an hour every night to singing with my little angel band. When I awake in the night or when morning comes, I hear their sweet singing around my bed."

A. A. McCormick writes: "The Progressive Thinker is a grand and great paper. Well, Mr. Editor, keep up your Home Circle in the paper. I think it is a grand thing. George W. Kates and wife will be in Hillsboro, Texas, March 17, and we are going to try to make everything as bright for them as possible while here. Of course we are all a little bit mossy. We are all more or less ashamed to get out and fight for our cause publicly, as we ought to."

Dr. J. L. York, prominent as a worker in the fields of reform, writes as follows of the death of Mrs. Laura E. Peters, at Port Angeles, Washington: "We received with sadness the news of Laura E. Peters' passing away, and yet, knowing how long she has suffered we cannot mourn her release from life in which she could no longer find comfort and usefulness. She was a good soul and a sincere and brave worker in the cause of truth, and ever ready to lend a hand in the noble work of the emancipation of mankind from the bondage of ignorance and superstition. I write these lines from a long and happy personal experience and acquaintance with her in all of my early work in Seattle, and will never forget her friendship and kindness to me in my work during all those years, when we battled together for mental liberty, and from first to last she has maintained those sterling elements of character which made her above the average in intellect and a true wife, mother and devoted friend. Let her rest. Cover her grave with flowers, and I only wished that I possessed her abiding faith in conscious life beyond the grave, and can heartily endorse the statement of her bereft husband: 'The world has been a bit brighter and better for her having lived in it.' All I have said of her I trust may be said of me when the measure of life is full and my work is done, and then I shall be content. So it is, one by one the ties of earth are severed, and like withered leaves we fall to the bosom of Mother Earth, and if only to rest and sleep it is well. But if to take up life on a higher plane and meet and know and love those we knew on earth, it is better, and in either case I am sure that infinite nature will do all things well. In her I trust."

G. H. Brooks writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "The Unity Spiritual Society, which meets in the Ethical Building, 558 Jefferson street, will celebrate the anniversary. It will give a dancing party in the hall Saturday evening; then hold two services, Sunday afternoon at three o'clock, and evening at half past seven. It is hoped there will be a goodly attendance from adjoining places. A very large euchr party was held at the residence of Henry Smith, 770 Booth street, Wednesday evening. The society is gay, with different kinds of entertainments and socials. A musicale will be held at Henry Smith's, on the 19th."

Henry H. Warner may be addressed at Hotel Columbia, Denver, Colo., and he would like engagements in vicinity.

Marguerite St. Omer Briggs is said to be doing a grand work for the Society of Spiritual Unity, Detroit, Mich. She can be secured as speaker and test medium for coming camp season. Her address is No. 100 Clifford street. The society will hold anniversary services, March 23. Mrs. Jenkins and others will assist.

R. D. Morrison, M. D., writes: "I have been taking spiritual papers and journals for thirty years, and I want to tell you that The Progressive Thinker is decidedly the best. I don't know how I could live through the weeks without it, and just think we get it for one dollar per year, and eight beautiful premium books for almost nothing. I don't understand, Brother Francis, how you can afford to do it."

Dr. Louis H. Freedman, 3036 Indiana avenue, informs us that Dr. Harrison Hipp lately performed a successful surgical operation on his neck. He was under the influence of ether two and a half hours. The Doctor hopes to be about soon, and able to tend to his patients. We are glad to learn that he passed through the trying ordeal safely.

L. de Forrest writes: "The Band of Harmony will hold its annual Experience Meeting at its rooms, 608 Handel Handel Hall, 40 Randolph street, Thursday evening, March 20. Each member will earn a dollar, bring it and relate how it was earned, and how much pleasure it gives to contribute the mite to so worthy a cause. No limitation is placed upon the amounts over one dollar. Come everybody and have a good time. Any friends can have the same privilege. Afternoon session at 3 o'clock."

Mrs. Maggie Waite, the well-known platform test medium, is now located at No. 3116 Wabash avenue, Chicago. She can be reached by telephone, "Phone Green 724." She can be consulted daily. Mrs. Waite intends, we are glad to learn, to remain in the city for some time.

Stephen Gardner writes: "Rural mail carrier has to-day delivered our three premium books. We now have the eight books—a splendid library, for which we feel very thankful. The Progressive Thinker is always a welcome guest. I am nearing 84, and so long as I am here, you may count on me as a subscriber."

The Michigan State Spiritual Association will hold a mass convention, in Longwell's Opera House, Paw Paw, Mich., March 28, 29 and 30. 1902. All are invited to attend these meetings as we anticipate having an enjoyable as well as instructive convention. E. E. Carpenter, president Michigan State Spiritual Association, Detroit, Mich. Laura Mattlock, secretary, Owosso, Mich.

Carrie Eloise Holmes writes from Sullivan, Ind.: "Our Psychical Research Society has had the services of Mrs. Jackson, the psychometrist, clairvoyant and clairaudient medium, whose home is in Grand Rapids, Mich. She has been with us a week. Every test has been absolutely perfect. She will remain with us a week or so longer and is open to engagements. Address her here."

Columbus Wells writes: "I heartily thank you for the premium book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. It is a very interesting and instructive work. It puts a man in mind to make good and high resolves and then live up to them."

Mrs. Dr. Edwards has returned to Chicago, and is located at 544 North Clark street.

C. F. Van Luven writes: "The Oakland (Cal.) Spiritualist Temple Association will celebrate the Fifty-fourth Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, at Woodman Hall, 521 Twelfth street, March 30, at 2:30 and 7:30 p. m. Chas. J. Anderson, the eloquent boy orator, and other prominent workers will take part in the exercises. There will be a grand banquet at 5 p. m. There will be recitations and solos rendered by local talent. Special music by the Ideal Mandolin and Guitar Orchestra, under the leadership of Prof. C. Pedersen. All are cordially invited to attend. Seats free."

To the Spiritualists of New York.

Dear Brethren:—Vigilance is the price of liberty. I have been out of the state since January, and have been very busy, and, perhaps, not as watchful as was my duty. The doctors have forced a vaccination bill through our State Senate. We are now all to be considered criminals and suffer the penalties of the law unless we allow some doctor to inject poison into our veins.

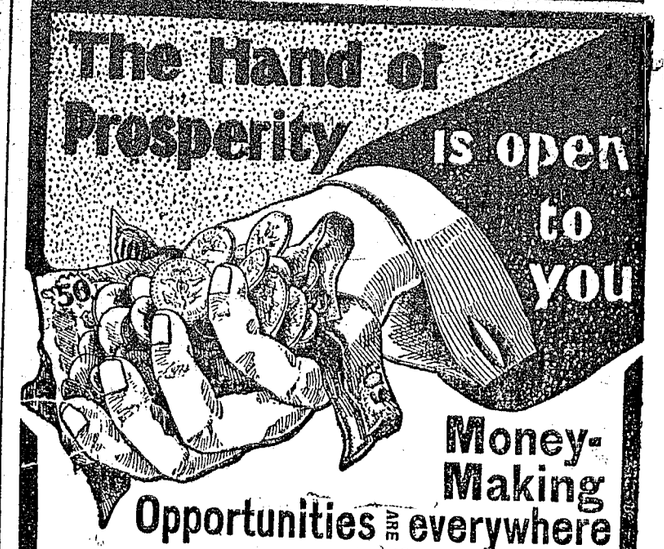
We have no objections to those being vaccinated who wish it; but in no case should we who are conscientiously opposed to it be compelled to submit to any such act of tyranny. The best place to fight this matter is in the legislature.

If vaccination is a preventive of small-pox, why should we, who prefer even small-pox to the greater evils which sometimes accompany vaccination be compelled to submit to it? If small-pox is not catching among the vaccinated, why not allow those who prefer it to vaccination have it to their heart's content. It can harm no others. Where is the danger?

If, on the other hand, vaccination does not prevent small-pox, then why should we be compelled to submit to it? In any case let us now present a solid front against it. We may be able to kill the bill in the assembly, or even with the governor, after the assembly shall have passed it.

What shall we do? I have written for a hearing before the assembly committee on the question. I have also written Dr. Sellen, the vice-president of the New York Anti-Vaccination Association, to gather the Anti-vaccination forces, to meet the M. Ds. before this committee.

I to-day write the president of the N. S. A. to be on hand and in the name of the N. S. A. assist in making this fight. I am also appealing to the officers of the N. S. A. to assist in this work. I shall be present at the hearing if we get one.



Now, let every Spiritualist, and every anti-vaccinationist write their assemblyman to fight this bill. They must know that we are alive and mean business.

Let every one who can, contribute from one to fifty dollars to assist in this work. Send your contributions to H. A. Richardson, treasurer of the N. Y. A. of S. Address him at East Aurora, N. Y. If we fail to get the desired hearing, the means can be expended in other good work in this state.

Address me until April 1, at 715 12th street, N. W., Washington, D. C.

Yours to try to save something of what there is left of our liberties,

MOSES HULL.

Money-Making Opportunities are everywhere

There is no reason why the year 1902 should not be the most prosperous you have ever known. If you cannot see these opportunities train your mind to do so. Riches and fame come only to those who can influence and control the minds of their fellow men. Every self-made wealthy man is a living proof of this fact. You have but one brain, one pair of hands; you cannot do everything, but you can in your own home learn in an incredibly short time how to influence, control and direct the brains and hands of other people so as to put money into your pocket. You can bend their wills and make them do your bidding. You can learn the science of success, and pass your competitors in business, in social life, in politics or in any other direction you choose. You can charm and facinate people with an irresistible power and hold their love and friendship always. You can command success in all you undertake.

You need a knowledge of Hypnotism and Personal Magnetism to attain this result. These sciences are the very life blood of business and social success.

Valuable Secrets Free The American College of Sciences, of Philadelphia, has in response to a popular demand issued a handsomely illustrated book, which clearly explains the secrets of the wonder science of the age. Twenty different authors of world-wide renown have contributed to it. A number of different methods are described which any intelligent man or woman can follow and materially better his or her condition in life. The secret of the money-making power of Carnegie, Morgan, Rockefeller and the Vanderbilts is made plain. The book tells how you can use Hypnotism to cure diseases and bad habits; how to make this grand science a potent factor in your life. It is full of intensely interesting and practical information. It is heartily endorsed by the most prominent doctors, lawyers, clergymen and financiers of this country. It has been issued at great expense, but to each interested person a copy will be sent postpaid for a limited time. If you want to acquire a wonderful power of personal influence; if you wish to rise higher in your accepted business or calling; if you wish to become a veritable leader of men—a man of mark in your community, send your name and address for a copy of this remarkable book which reveals to you the inner mysteries of the most marvelous mind and soul power known to man.

Capt. C. F. Strong of Dryden, N. Y., says: "Every sentence in your grand work is a gem; every thought divine; money could not buy the knowledge I have gained."

GOOD WORK IN BUFFALO.

The Spiritual Bazaar of the First Church.

The First Spiritual Church of Buffalo, of which Rev. Moses Hull is pastor, is doing a good work for the cause of Spiritualism, including its humanitarian efforts and general reforms. Just now Mrs. Atcheson is serving in place of the pastor, and drawing large houses, and adding memberships.

I am glad to know this, for I regard her as an honest medium and worthy woman. Moses scatters himself over too much territory to hold the fort alone in Buffalo. Mrs. Matteson, the clairvoyant doctor, has done a splendid work for the cause and for the sick as well; and but for her the First Spiritual Church of Buffalo would probably never have been. Her energy, business tact, influence with business men, and her money made it possible.

Her daughter, Mrs. Nellie Whitcomb, is an active worker for the bazaar which is to be held the last week of March; and she will appreciate any help from friends or other societies, and I think I may safely say that she and her co-workers in Buffalo will be liberal in reciprocating favors from other societies. This is a good way to extend acquaintances, and enlarge social spheres, and thus mutually benefit.

Any society that feels an interest in the good work may do itself credit and enjoy a real benefit by making up a package of donations in money or any salable article, from a fan, a five-cent handkerchief, a book, a necktie, a painting, to a watch or a $10 note. Any amount, large or small, will be appreciated and used for the benefit of the bazaar and the cause. Address all donations for this "Independent Spiritual Booth" to Mrs. Nellie Whitcomb, 248 N. Division street, Buffalo, N. Y.

I am informed that the society is trying to get ready to enlarge its Temple—or church—as there is not room for the growing audiences, and this fair is to help in this laudable effort. This is a good report, for those who think Spiritualism is on the decline.

Let us realize that the cause is ours wherever it may be represented, and help all we can to advance the good work.

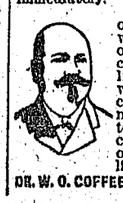
THANK GOD! I CAN SEE AGAIN.

A. J. Palmer, After Being Totally Blind, is Cured at Home by Dr. Coffee.



A. J. Palmer of Melrose, Iowa, tells all about his eye trouble and his cure, so anyone can understand it in Dr. W. O. Coffee's 80 page book, "The New System of Treating Diseases of the eye." This case and dozens of others, illustrated with colored cuts, showing exact trouble. Valuable information, interesting reading and free if you describe your case or some friend's.

"The first I noticed anything wrong with my eyes was in December 1898. They commenced to matter and the lids stuck together and got a little sore and inflamed, and this lasted for a month or two. Each week they got worse until they got to be painful; sharp, neuralgic pains went through them at all times during the day and at night; then ulcers came on the sight which made me blind very rapidly, but it was in July, 1900, when I got totally blind, and I suffered with the most terrible inflammation and ulcers on the sight, and scums over the sight that a person could suffer. After I had doctored with several other doctors, I got no relief. I wrote to Dr. Coffee and put myself under his treatment. He doctored my eyes with mild medicines that soothed them, and stopped the pain in three days. My sight commenced to improve, and ulcers that had been there for a year, commenced to heal, and in three weeks I could see to read large print, and in three months time my eyes were perfectly well. I thank God I can see again. He used no blue stone nor caustic or any strong medicine, and I want to say to anyone who is afflicted with inflammation or weak eyes, that I think his Absorption Treatment is the most wonderful thing in the world, and you should write him immediately."

Dr. Coffee is the originator of the Absorption Treatment which cures you at home without any operation, and at small cost, of cataracts, granulated lids, scums, films, sore, weak or watery eyes or failing sight, complete paralysis of optic nerve only, excepted. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. H. H. H., Kansas City, Mo.: Q. Who founded the Alexandrian Library? By whom was it destroyed, and for what cause?

A. This most famous, and largest library of ancient times, was founded by Ptolemy Soter, 323 before our era. He was the founder of the Lagides or Macedonian dynasty, and first of the line of thirteen kings who ruled over Egypt under that name. He was one of the foremost generals of Alexander the Great, and after the death of that warrior was appointed governor of that country. With the noble love of knowledge of the Greeks, he founded the library, and a school to which he invited the most famous philosophers of his time.

His son, Ptolemy Philadelphus, continued the labors of his father and accumulated 400,000 rolls of MSS. He had the most careful scholars and copyists, who made copies of MSS. loaned him by their fortunate possessors, and by this school, at his command, tradition affirms the preparation of the septuagint was commenced.

The laudable object of the collection of the priceless treasures of thought, was continued by this noble dynasty until 395 of our era, or for over 700 years, when it is said to have contained 700,000 rolls of MSS. or volumes.

Printing being unknown, all books were written on parchment or papyrus, in continuous rolls. The material was scarce and costly, the labor of making a copy great, and often the author's original MS. was the only one in existence. Hence a collection of these MSS. meant something entirely different from a library of the present. A great library as of Harvard, or Boston, or Paris might be destroyed and yet thousands of copies of its best books be preserved in other collections. With only one library in the world, and this having the only copy, or a copy of not to exceed three or four in existence, destruction meant the complete blotting out of such books, and all record of the thoughts they contained.

There is no doubt but the Alexandrian Library contained the almost complete treasures of the ancient pagan civilizations of Assyria, Persia, Egypt, Greece and Rome.

But an age had come when learning, was scorned, and ignorance and credulity the most praiseworthy.

The Christian doctrine had gained ascendancy over the splendid teachings of philosophy, and the rule of the priest transformed the government into a theocracy, which made kings and emperors slaves, leaving them boastful of ignorance so dense that they could not write their names.

Theophilus, one of the most brutal, conniving and bigoted of the priests, became seated on the archi-episcopal throne of the diocese of Alexandria. He hated the old nature-religion; he hated learning; he hated the philosophers. Historians say of him: "He was a bold, bad man, whose hands were alternately polluted with gold and with blood."

In 395 of our era, he promoted an attack on the old religion by his bigoted and lustful followers. They sacked and demolished the beautiful temples, broke the exquisite marbles of the sculptors, and destroyed the writings wherever found. The Alexandrian Library was the object of his insatiate religious madness, and its priceless rolls were committed to the flames. Everything by which future generations might gain an insight into the beginnings of Christianity; everything written concerning it by unbelievers, if anything had been written, was destroyed. Christianity was made to stand for itself and to be its only witness. The utter, otherwise unaccountable silence of pagan writers, was accounted for.

But this was not enough for the theologians who promoted the cause of Christianity. In after years, the fact that the treasures of antiquity were destroyed by a swinish horde led by an archbishop whose power was about equal to that of the pope, reflected on the character of the church, and priests attempted to throw the disgrace on the hated Mohammedans. The story was started six hundred years after the event, that the Caliph Omar in 642 D. C., after the capture of Alexandria, ordered the library to be destroyed. He is reported as saying: "If these writings of the Greeks agree with the Koran, they are useless; if they disagree they are pernicious and ought to be destroyed." The six thousand baths of the city were heated with the precious rolls, and such was their vast number that they lasted for six months!

Not a historian of the time mentions this destruction of the library, and it is entirely opposed to the character of the Arabians, who regarded books with reverence akin to adoration, and while Europe was in the night of besotted ignorance, were keeping brightly burning the torch of Grecian learning.

There is not a dissenting voice as to the destruction of the library by Theophilus the Christian ruler, and if there was a library at Alexandria for Omar to use in heating the baths, it had been gathered in the intervening centuries between 395 and 642 A. D. Had such a library been collected, it would not have contained many of the writings of the poets, historians and philosophers of paganism, but its shelves would have been plethoric with the commentaries and religious lucubrations, the fabulous chronicles and accounts of miracles which characterize that period. Had the victorous Omar destroyed them all it would have benefited mankind. Hence, according to the most trustworthy and unimpeachable historic authorities, the most wonderful collection of literature of the ancient world was destroyed by Christians, to gratify their hatred for the old nature-religion which mocked them with the splendid galaxy of poets, historians, sages and moralists, in comparison with their canting priests, their herds of monks and ascetics boasting of their squalid filth, and ignorance of the amenities of life and common decency.

The fate of that old nature-worship, of the ancient civilization, is fulfilled in that of Hypatia, daughter of Theon the philosopher, and queen of philosophy, the most beautiful and accomplished woman in the falling shadows of that glorious age. She taught philosophy in a school thronged with her disciples, in the same city of Alexandria. Her success, to the distorted minds of the Christian leaders seemed like a revival of the paganism they were laboring to destroy. Hence St. Cyril, Bishop of Alexandria, gathered a mob, of the zealous church-members, and the savages from the environs of that cosmopolitan city, and these breaking into her lecture-room, dispersed or killed her disciples, dragged her from the rostrum, and literally tore her to pieces like infuriated beasts, and then howling at their deed, dragged the fragments through the city.

Hypatia in the gathering darkness of the beginning of the fifth century, represents the last flickering torch of learning, which with her expired, nor was again re-lighted until after more than a thousand years of darkness had fallen like an incubus on mankind. In her place that of the strong, intelligent woman who thinks and dares and leads in the practical ways of life, came the weak, pliant, yielding, obedient, and self-abnegating, pale and bloodless Mother of Pain.

George B. Ferris. Q. Do spirits appear to mediums, always as they really are?

A. When spirits appear objectively, that is, when seen by the spiritual perception, as objects are seen by the physical eye, they appear just as they are, and have the form and size they would have here as mature human beings, or as they would have at their age, if they departed earth life before maturity.

But it is not often that spiritual appearances are presented in this manner. They are subjective—that is, impressions or pictures made on the mind, just as the magnetizer magnetizes his subject and makes him see anything he wishes. The spirit stands in the place of the magnetizer, and the medium sees whatever the spirit suggests or wishes. Thus the appearance of spirits wearing familiar garments worn in earth life, the same cut of hair, beard, etc. This is for the purpose of proving their identity. Animals appear, as the familiar dog, etc. These are pictures, impressions made so vividly that the medium mistakes them for reality. As there is no means by which the recipient can compare these impressions or pictures, to determine size, locality, etc., he may make the strangest blunders in describing them. Hence such impressions may be genuine, and are strictly explainable by psychic laws, yet we should not for a moment take them as showing that such is the real size, or conditions of the spirits thus appearing.

Woman Suffrage in Utah.

Hon. Fred J. Kirsel, ex-member of the Utah Legislature, was at one time a strong opposer of woman suffrage, but has become converted to it since seeing its practical workings. When asked for the reasons of his change, he said:

"I was afraid of the votes of the women owing to the preponderance of the dominant church, which I was afraid would use its power perniciously with the female members of its creed, and perpetuate its political ascendency. A trial of six years of the system in Utah has convinced me that the women can be safely trusted, and that either the dominant church has chosen not to use its influence politically with its women members, or that the women would not tolerate dictation. I am inclined to believe the latter was the case, and believe that the constitutional convention acted wisely in conferring female suffrage. The result has been educational and elevating and not justifying the fears which I had expressed. Its practical demonstrations in my household, where the head only is a Democrat, whilst the female members consistently vote as Republicans.

"I repeat that in justice to the ladies and my new convictions, I could not do otherwise than vote for the memorial."

ARE WE NOT BROTHERS?

A Lecturette by Hudson Tuttle.

Prince Wolkonsky, when invited to a meeting where it was proposed to adopt measures for the founding of a universal brotherhood, did not attend, because, he said, mankind were already brothers, and the troubles and trials were because they knew it not.

Among all the grand thoughts uttered at the various meetings at the world's great fair at Chicago, none were more profound, or truthful. For eighteen hundred years the "fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man" has been repeated, with the thoughtless imitation of the parrot, while surrounding nations were treated as implacable enemies without rights. The heathen nations, five sixths of mankind, were destined for hell, and the socalled Christian nations appear to think that the appointed thing to do is to make a hell on earth for these unbelievers and for themselves. The word foreigner, from the beginning equivalent to enemy, has been used to justify wholesale cruelty and slaughter. The plains of Europe have been enriched with the noblest blood of countless thousands, by kingly wars, and the more awful and malignant conflicts fanned by the fierce flames of religious bigotry and hate.

The greater half of inventive skill and scientific art has been employed in devising engines of destruction and bulwarks of defense. From breaking a limb for a club, and adjusting to the bow the poisoned stone-arrow, to the Krupp gun and gatling battery; from the war canoe to the iron-clad battleship, lie ages of labor directed to the purpose of destruction. Until most recent times the fundamental doctrine of political economy was that the prosperity of one nation depended on the ruin of surrounding states. The growth of nations was a perpetual menace to their neighbors.

The heritage of hate has come to our own time, and after nineteen hundred years of the doctrine of divine brotherhood, behold the Nations—the civilized, educated, Christian Nations—stand massed along their borders armed with the last and most awful engines of destruction; ready at the word of command of king, or potentate, to spring at each other's throats, and murder or be murdered. And even this great Republic, which sits alone and undisputed ruler of the western world, expends year by year more for war than for peace, and honors the red-handed warriors above all others.

Whatever poetry and glamor there once was when the hero strode before opposing hosts ready to decide the combat with his own good sword, its day has passed and the soldier who now goes to the battle-field insensible to the fact that he will be a target for machines that pour forth a storm of balls with a precision no human effort can equal, and reduces bravery and cowardice to common dust, shows more ignorance than courage. The cynic may well laugh at the idea of national brotherhood! Love at the muzzle of rifled cannon! Peace with the bayonet thrust. Fraternity with the rattle of galing guns! Christianity in the cabin of the armored battleship!

Narrowing our horizon to our individual life, are we fraternal? Do we love our neighbors as ourselves? Is the truth triumphant? Is the angel of brotherhood present, yet unseen?

Are our criminal laws for reform, or for punishment and vengeance? For the erring have we charity or hatred? We have but to look into any of the many prisons, east or west to witness scenes of appalling horror. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord." "Vengeance is mine," echoes the law.

Not enough to send the unfortunate and misdirected criminal out of the world by hanging; science is called on to contribute her latest achievements in grasping the lightnings, and the quaking prisoner, helpless as a tethered animal is bound to the electrocution chair. Learned professors superintend the voltage which rends every cell and fibre with fierce agony asunder. Then is this unspeakably dreadful murder reported in the leading journals as having been remarkably successful! And yet, it is said, the trembling victim between the electrodes is a brother. Laws are so unjust that while the few waste in wanton luxury, the many starve. To maintain the idle one, a thousand lie down on hard beds with aching bones. To-night, every night, in America and England two million souls, decrepit age, strong manhood, tender childhood will wait the gray morning sleepless with hunger. With warehouses bursting with food, the famished mother weeps at the appeal of her famished child. Under the shadow of the church, hopeless virtue sells its soul to infamy for a crust to prolong life for continued torture.

Oh, Spiritualism, divinely fair and clear of sight, can you not solve the mystery and give us answer? Mankind has repeated the word "Brotherhood," but it has been a brotherhood to be created by common belief and not a fact of human nature. No less a brother is the Moslem for his Koran; the Persian for his Zend Avesta; the Hindu for Vedas; the Chinese for his Book of Kings. There has been more than one Christ; each race has a savior of its own. Zeus, Jupiter, Ormuzd, Allah, God, what are these but names for the same vague understanding or misunderstanding of the phenomena of nature and of life?

The brotherhood of mankind is expressed in the common heritage, the heirship to immortal life. We are all spiritual beings here in these terrestrial bodies and have already begun our endless journey through the spheres of light. We are to-day in the courts of heaven and the presence of God as much as we ever shall be in the ages of the future. We are spiritual beings now, and our purpose is not to live for glory in the next life, but for happiness and perfection in this; not to die well, but to live well, for the best preparation for life hereafter is right living here.

If this new philosophy of life has one truth more important than another, it is this—the heirship of a realm where all are immortal spirits with infinite possibilities. This makes us all kindred, and this world an inn, where we tarry for a day in our onward march.

As spiritual beings, it is our task and duty to eradicate the brutal, selfish propensities; to substitute love and charity for hate, the angelic for the tiger. The things of the world may be good for the world, but a pure and noble spirit is a priceless treasure. Such a spirit will not rest as long as there is a soul a-hungered, or a-thirst, a child in rags, a family without a home, a heart despairing, a mind oppressed. Until all are free, all basking in the beams of happiness coming from just laws, justly administered, such a spirit will find work to do, and in doing it, most supreme joy.

When I see the criminal cringing before the rude, unfeeling justice of the law, I picture an angel from the sphere of light, bending low, and taking him by the hand, leading him even from the scaffold to a higher life, where, under the guidance of those who know nothing of vengeance, or punishment for punishment's sake, his ignorance will be replaced with knowledge. And I think again, ages hence, perhaps; in the unfathomable future, we shall meet and perhaps gladly acknowledge his superior purity and wisdom. HUDSON TUTTLE.

AN OCCULT EXPERIENCE.

The Mysterious Letter, and Its Result.

A friend of mine relates the following remarkable story. It was in the winter of 1897, while engaged in a business which required a great deal of correspondence, and of course the bulk of this work fell to my lot to personally open, read and answer these letters, which of course took up a great deal of my time, and leaving me but very little time to aid the firm in its other departments of business. We were then located in a prominent city in Missouri, and one evening the postman on his usual round of delivery of mail handed me a bunch of letters among the other large mail. This was nothing uncommon nor surprising, for it occurred almost daily and in nearly every mail; but while I untied the bundle of letters and began to sort them for the different departments, one letter in particular attracted my special attention. It was not different in appearance, nor size, nor shape, nor was the handwriting very different from the rest, to cause this attraction. At any rate, I laid it aside from the rest, for some reason at the time unexplainable to me. An unseen force seemed at the moment to guide my thoughts, for after having attended to all the other mail, I again took up this particular letter. The very touch seemed to electrify me, for as yet I had not opened it. I took it up as any other letter had been, yet I hesitated to open it; I touched and handled it with a feeling akin to wonder, why this particular letter should attract my special attention in such a way, more than any other of the same day's mail.

The post stamp was from an Eastern State, a small place, which I looked up in my atlas, being a town of nearly 3,000 inhabitants, a beautifully situated place among the Eastern hills and mountains; but as yet I had not opened it.

Strange indeed are the intuitive workings of the human mind. Having been a silent investigator of these occult mental forces for a number of years, I yet held this tiny letter in my left hand, meditating, marveling and mentally asking: What is the attractive force here?

I was alone in my particular part of the office, and my meditation was not noticed by the other employes, so letting my somewhat trained mind have full play to attract to myself the hidden mystery of this letter and the person writing it, I received the following message, and at the same instant saw a picture intended only for myself, which I will try to tell in as few words as possible: "I am in great trouble, help me! O, help me!"

This was seemingly imparted to the letter by the writer unintentionally, yet the writing paper was a magnetically receptive article to take on the conditions from the writer and convey them to my also at the time receptive mind. These things are possible in all correspondence, and can thereby reveal the writer's true personality, contradictory to his written message, for the acute mentally developed mind of some sensitive and occultly educated person will intercept the true message irrespective of the written intended one on paper.

But this is a double transmission to me by this letter, for I also see the person, a very sensitive, greatly misunderstood, much abused, tortured and wronged woman of about 40 years of age. I see her sick, suffering and fast going to life's end, if timely aid is not rendered someway. I sense a large house, shade, and a stream, and the vision is ended, for I see no more. So deeply was I absorbed in the message and picture, that I was reflectively lost in meditating and dreaming, until by the step of my superior I was aroused from my lethargy. "Well, how about this evening's mail?" he said, "quite tired ain't you? Well, it seems work is our lot here on this earth plane, and I hope it will prepare us for the future life of which we hear so much and varied ideas, so that we will enjoy ourselves there better and with more satisfaction than we can here where we find it so difficult to be understood by our fellow men."

The doctor was an old and very successful man in his profession, enjoying quite an extensive practice, but yet I had not opened this letter, and mechanically opening it handed it to the doctor, who read it, and tossed it back to me on the desk, yet hardly had it left his hands when he picked it up again, and holding it close to his forehead a moment, he said: "Well, this is the old human story of agony, suffering and abuse. I wonder if the human race will ever learn life's important lesson of true mating, true living and true health principles?"

"What is it, doctor?" I asked him, "a severe case? one of those incurable ones?"

"Well, yes, both," he said, "from a medical point of view there is no aid to this patient; it's only by the aid of these forces which we handle here, that any possible aid can be given," he said. He therefore dictated a short letter to this lady, and I performed it on my typewriter and mailed it with the others.

In the course of our regular business I had about forgotten this peculiar letter, when one morning a stranger was ushered into our office waiting-room. I shall overgo all that transpired between her and the doctor, for after she was gone the doctor informed me that this was the lady who had written some few months previous.

I seemed to be in a dream at times, mentally following this lady, for she had taken lodging at a prominent place in the city close to our place of business in order that she could come for treatments daily. I had many opportunities of reading her sweet sad face, but being only a clerk, I did not vouchsafe to speak to her, nevertheless an attraction between us was already established, for when the doctor was engaged in the treatment room, she was sometimes compelled to wait her turn of treatment in the waiting-room, and on several occasions she addressed me on various topics of the great West, and our city, etc. She began to improve daily, and when she prepared to return to her Eastern home, quite an acquaintance had been established between us. I learned that she was a married lady, and the picture which I had seen in or through the mediumship of that strange letter was reviewed to me by her conversation.

I shall perhaps tire you, kind reader, with a lengthy friendship correspondence which followed between us. She took a delight in describing the fashions and customs of the manufacturing East, and I exchanged Western ideas with her. Several years had passed since then, when one day I received another letter from my fair Eastern correspondent in which she related to me her widowhood, her husband having been called to the great beyond. They had not of late years lived very happily together, as is the case with so many mismated couples. You may also have surmised by this time that I was one of those peculiar men, never having been espoused, for the reason that I could never marry a woman until that satisfying mutual feeling should manifest itself to me which I always held in my mind as my ideal of married life; but another epoch of experience has passed away and an arrangement was agreed to between my fair Eastern friend and myself, that we were in everything suitable to each other, and since we had no one to ask permission as to why we should not join our forces for a life of conjugal bliss and happiness, we were married one fair summer's day; and I must say that the ways of nature are indeed mysterious and wonderful, since strangers of two different sexes should be shown each other in so strange a way, in so true a condition of mind, body and circumstance as to know and love each other many long years even before the reality can be manifest; considering that a letter without written words nor painted picture by human hand can be the true yet mysterious messenger.

While I write this my life's companion looks over my shoulder approvingly, smiling. She says, "Yes, dear, tell it to the hungry souls striving to solve life's mysterious ways. Perhaps a knowledge of the occult forces will guide and aid and save many a deserving one." PROF. PH. NAGEL.

UNCLE GABE IN HEAVEN.

The sun shone forth majestic o'er the green New Hampshire hills,
And wreathed in golden glory her mountains, woods and rills;
It painted lights and shadows on Cocheco's dancing tide,
And lingered gently on the house where
Uncle Gabe had died.

His was a sunny nature, little given to renown,
But known as all the children's friend
throughout that rural town;
They held his hands, they kissed his cheeks, they climbed upon his knee,
They filled his wagon brimming full—
it was a sight to see.

His Susan passed in earlier years on to
to that brighter shore,
While one by one beside her grave he laid his children—four;
And though his head was white with years, his heart was all aglow
With love, and Gabe brought sunshine wher'er he chanced to go.

One day came an unbidden guest, enrobed in garments bright,
And he bore the soul of Uncle Gabe away one stormy night;
Away like the mists of morning sped
the angel and Uncle Gabe
And each child that he loved and petted laid a flower on his grave.

They came to the gates of heaven,
Saint Peter with watchful care,
Gazed out at the waiting stranger, then questioned "Whom have you there?"
A pilgrim from old New Hampshire,
just here from a world of sin,
But he loved the beautiful children.
Said Peter, "Please ask him in."

So Uncle Gabe and the angel passed in at the open door,
While the foremost there to greet him were his Sue and children four—Bennie and Jim and Bessie and the wee one, Little 'Gene,
And they led him by running waters,
where fields were ever green.

To say that Gabe was happy would be "drawing it rather mild;"
He just sat down in the sunshine and cried like a little child;
Flowers bloomed in wondrous beauty,
birds sang their sweetest lay,
And about like glistening sunbeams were children at their play.

The next that gave Gabe greeting was a woman whose weary feet
Trod the sorrowful path of an outcast through many an earthly street;
"Cast out by men" was the verdict; but
dear old Uncle Gabe
Had done her many a kindness ere she filled a pauper's grave.

Then Uncle Gabe and the angel passed on by another road,
And they met a weary mortal who had borne rum's weary load;
"God bless you," murmured the pilgrim, as his eyes grew strangely bright—
"Many a time your old farm wagon bore me safely home at night."

They walked 'neath a grove whose branches re-echoed the whole day long
With strains of sweet music, trembling, and the slave's salvation song;
"Massa Gabe and de good Lord's angel come to set the black man free;
De night is past, de daybreak dawns—
de day of jubilee."

Then he met the meek and humble, not the rich and proud of heart;
They spoke of his deeds of kindness, and how well he did his part;
So we find that gold nor riches count not on Life's ledger when You crowd wrong or oppression round the hearts of fellow-men.

And we find the words soft spoken in a gentle, loving tone,
Can soften a nature warped by wrong and well nigh turned to stone;
Not with prayers nor supplications did
Uncle Gabe pave the way,
But a love for all God's children throughout each livelong day.

THE KOLA PLANT

Cures Asthma

Write for Free Trial Treatment.

The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Asthma. In the short time since its discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing Specific Cure for every form of Asthma. Its cures are really marvellous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Virginia, writes to the New York World, on July 23rd, that it cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing, and Mrs. E. Johnson, of No. 17 Second St., Washington, D.C., testifies that for years she had to sleep propped up in a chair unable to lie down night or day. The Kola plant cured her at once. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine, of Washington, D. C., was also cured when he could not lie down for fear of choking. Hundreds of other sufferers including Rev. S. H. Eisenberg, Center Hall, Pa., and Rev. John L. Moore, Alice, S. C., give similar testimony, proving it truly a wonderful remedy. If you suffer from Asthma in any form, in order to prove the power of this new botanical discovery, we will send you one Large Case by mail entirely free. All we request in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you absolutely nothing. Send your address to The Kola Importing Company, No. 1104 Broadway, New York.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS.

IN VISIONS.

A Manifestation of Spirit Power.

Death does not end our thought and feeling, but the discarnate spirit soars aloft into endless pastures of wisdom, and grasps in its mental vision knowledge far beyond the conception of the spirit incarnate. This same thought and feeling lowers to earth again, and if we will only heed its tender call, it will shower upon us facts unattainable by mortal mind. How glorious it is to hear angel voices vibrating in the whispering breezes; and as we peer into the corridors of the celestial sphere, how rapturous it is to behold those loved ones whom we have long mourned, thinking they were lost in the gloom of the tomb.

For a good while I have been eager in the investigation of Spiritualism, and I have ever found the way decked with garlands of roses, roses lit with heavenly beauty, and every little cloud floating above contained a silvery lining. No wonder Shakspeare said: "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamed of in your philosophy." O, could the whole world be convinced that the philosophy of Spiritualism is a beautiful truth.

I will relate a couple of the manifestations which I have received, and which helped to prove to me beyond doubt that before things transpire on this terrestrial globe, they are photographed on the other side of life.

About two years ago my grandmother was sick. I always called her mother, so I will call her by that name here.) The evening before she ascended to the realm of souls, I had a manifestation of spirit power. I saw a casket borne into the room by pall-bearers walking with slow and measured steps which were highly suggestive of a funeral march. I made a strong resolution to disbelieve the fact that they bore a casket, because as my mother was sick, I surmised what such a phantom scene would symbolize. Just at this time the solemn bearers placed their unwelcome burden down before me, and glided to one side. Then a greater illumination shone on the casket which made up to perfection. There was no avenue out of the direful fact that it was a casket.

But also there stood my sister who had entered the corridors of heaven in babyhood, and in accents divinely sweet she said: "Mother is going to leave you. Do you want to see how she will look when she gets there?" I said "Yes."

Then an intervening portal seemed to be rent in twain—oh, most radiant, rapturous scene. There amid gently waving amaranthine bowers and snowy pillars, my mother serenely reposed, her raiments gleaming with heavenly lustre, and flowing in graceful folds around her to the floor. A peaceful smile lit up her countenance, that was glorious to behold. The entire scene bespoke rest, sweet rest; such placid repose that attendeth not the spirit of mortals. The next day the "boatman pale" carried our mother across "the mystic river" to the great Beyond, while her earthly tabernacle lay so still and beauteous in the icy clasp of Death.

Here is another manifestation which ever holds an intense interest for me. When Yuletide comes in all its resplendent beauty, I find a fascinating pleasure in presenting the holy Jesus with a slight token of my remembrance and esteem for his loving kindness. Every time I make the presentation, He responds in a most graciously gratifying and beautiful manner. One Christmas I made him a bouquet of lilies. In a short time I heard a click, and a great curtain seemed to have rolled back, and I was gazing, eyes open, far, far across an immense plain. No trees or hills were visible, but as far as the vision could penetrate the great expanse of plain stretched far in the distance. Flocks of sheeps lay in countless numbers upon the dew-gemmed ground. The trailing garments of the night seemed to hold a solemn stillness. Several shepherds were intensely gazing at an enchanting star which shone forth with great brightness.

Then I saw the blessed Savior upon whose kingly head rested a crown of thorns. The mouth which so many golden truths had uttered spoke in words so soft and musical, saying, "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Subsequent to this the wound in the side was indicated, and a milk-white dove nestled beneath it, and the words came, "This is your only salvation. This is your only rest." Again I heard the voice now solemnly, silvery sweet saying:

"You must be to judgment brought,
And answer in that day
For every vain and idle thought,
And every word you say."

This and other manifestations have made me perfectly assured of the reality of Spiritualism. It is my earnest desire that Spiritualism may live on and on. And as the pious Aeneus willingly bore on his back the aged Anchises, let everyone convinced of the truth of Spiritualism willingly bear its aged banner on to victory. Aged its banner is, because Spiritualism originated with the creation of the world, and will endure forever and for aye. O, may Spiritualism be as the tree of Lebanon, may it take root deep downward, may its branches extend throughout the entire universe, and may it ever be a living, vivid proof that the immortality of man is not a delusion, nor God an empty name. BIRDIE McLAIN.

Use of Prayer.

The pros and cons concerning prayer, in your excellent paper, by eminent writers, calls out a little experience and observations of my own.

In my public meetings, held for at least a dozen years in San Francisco (the Circle of Harmony), I usually opened with an invocation, and then, perchance, some one of the speakers (as all were at liberty to express their best thoughts) burlesqued prayer and in their egotism referred to the God within, "there was no other," etc. So to make myself repugnant to none at the next meeting, I omitted prayer, and the meeting was almost a failure. The speeches were cold and indifferent, and I found to my entire satisfaction, that an earnest prayer to the invisible world, harmonized and uplifted the minds of the audience with aspirations to be good, and to do good.

The no-prayer speeches were like a cold, wet blanket, chilling and repulsive, while those who were religiously inclined and had some reverence for a Deific principle, angels and spirits, went forth from our circle to do good, to ameliorate the condition of humanity, and until we can make a spear of grass, or a rose, to say nothing of all animate nature and systems of worlds, we do well to withhold our invectives, and to continue to pray that we may become wiser and better, healthier and happier until we are attuned to the wisdom of holy intelligences in the spheres.

Another instance concerning prayer, which occurred only last week. An eminent medium had come from the snow-clad hills of the North to spend the winter with us and to practice her mediumship, when she was unexpectedly called home to attend a sick friend. She sat down as she was all ready to start, and asked Uncle Walter (my only brother) to say one of his prayers. So with feeble voice, as he has been quite out of health this winter, he uttered the following as near as I can recall it:

"Oh, Thou who fillest immensity of space,
With thy sacred presence and boundless grace,
Whose energy is wisdom sustained by love
In all the heavenly spheres above,
Dost guide the pathway of each sparkling star
Through measureless ether and space afar,
Until thy glory shines from sun to sun,
And thy will in all the heavens is done,
From this little planet on which we be,
Our holiest thoughts ascend to thee,
With thankful hearts for blessings given
To help us onward up toward heaven.
And we observe that nations in their line
Keep step to the measureless cadence of time.
In harmony with thy love, in harmony with thy will,
In harmony with thy sacred presence still.
For thou art all in all, and will ever be
The maker of all human destiny,
In worlds without end forever more.
Let anthems of glory resound evermore—
Amen, and amen!"

In a few days we received a letter of her safe arrival, and enclosed were these words:

"I will never forget brother Walter's little prayer the morning I left. It took me out of the slough of despond, and I am happy, and will not let anything bother me."

Thousands of instances in favor of prayer could be related, not that our humble prayers change the purposes of the infinite, but have a tendency to tune our hearts to the sphere of harmony. F. A. LOGAN.

A New Treatment for Deafness and Catarrh.

Bradford McGregor, of Cincinnati, O., a well-known demonstrator of applied sciences, asserts as a fact that catarrh and deafness can be cured, this assertion following his personal experience. Having suffered for years with catarrh, which resulted in very poor health and almost total deafness, his condition became such that specialists refused longer to treat him, saying his case was hopeless. Thus thrown upon his own resources, after using all known applications, he finally devised a new method of treatment based upon a principle entirely different from anything he had ever used or heard of, and cured himself with it. His hearing is perfect now, health good and no catarrh. The success of this remarkable treatment in the many tests made upon those similarly afflicted has been phenomenal, and to further extend its usefulness and to prove that it will cure, a free trial and full explanation will be sent by Mr. McGregor to any who suffer and will address him at 430 Lincoln Inn Court, Cincinnati, O., and send twenty cents to pay the expense only for registering and mailing.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., president of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement. Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds. It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has a full page portrait of the angel heroine, from a spirit painting. Price, $1.00.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature: Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 22, 1902. NO. 643.

SPIRITUALISM, ITS SOURCE, COURSE AND GOAL

An Address Delivered by Florence E. B. Shaffer, before the Spiritualist State Convention of Texas.

The clearest concept of conscious passage to and existence in spirit life it has ever been my privilege to contemplate, is pictured forth in the following word-sketch, by Francis Gerry Fairfield:

My body slept. I stood and studied long
The set white lips. All things to me did seem
As unto one who wakens from a dream.
Around the bed, they talked in voices low
Of things that were as though I dreamed them long ago.

My wife sat weeping by. I bent and kissed
Her brow, her deep brown hair and pallid lips;
Her tear-stained eyes and the velvet finger-tips
That, in my fever-dreams, had spelled the pain,
With soft and magnet influence from my tortured brain.

They spoke of me as if of one just dead.
I saw their shapes as phantoms; and could hear
Their murmured tones—as with the inner ear
One hears sometimes, the yet unspoken thought
That stirs within the brain, but still is uttered not.

All things that real things had been before—
Solid—opaque—were now pellucid; and, like shadows,
Cleft asunder with the hand.
And I could pass through stone and mortared wall,
As though 'twere but a thing of vapor—that was all.

I whispered in her ear. She started not,
Nor seemed to hear me. Were her senses numb
With new-made woe? Or was my utterance dumb
To human ears? I drew a deep, deep sigh;
In vain—no answering look suffused her lovely eyes.

By slow degrees, upon my senses came
A world of new realities; and I saw Faces of strange beauty floating by.
While forms whose loveliness all earthly things transcended,
Hovered o'er me on extended wings.

A strange, strange impulse through my being stole.
I seemed as one who, until then, had been Encysted long a cold stone statue in;
A soft, sweet, mystic life-pulse trembled through My limbs. I saw not, heard not, thought not; only knew.

Yes, knew. And outer senses needed not.
Soft notes of music seemed to stir and thrill
With vague pulsations through me; yet were still.
I was as one whose being has been set
To melody; that, once heard, none ever can forget.

Like things of mist were solid rocks and trees.
Like things of mist the shapes of living men.
The universe was peopled o'er again.
So, through the outer world of matter, ran
A world whose beauty is intangible to man.

Bewildered—lost in thought—like one in trance,
Or one who threads by night some lonesome wood,—
Vague and uncertain—wondering—I stood.
One like an angel took my hand and said,
"Like thee, I am the soul of one but lately dead."

And how wondrously does this view of passing onward differ from those held up for my consideration when a child. I was consolingly referred to "the dark river of death," which I must cross because I was "born in sin;" and somehow was made to feel that I was responsible for being so born. On the other side of this beauteous (?) stream, I was sure to be met by a fierce judge who would demand an account of every secret thought; for the thinking of which, if any failed to please him, I should be condemned to eternal punishment in a lake of fire and brimstone. Comforting, was it not? Which might we naturally prefer? The former, with many added characteristics tending to allure the soul heavenward, is taught by our grand and holy cause, Spiritualism; and gladly we learn it, for, while the old orthodox picture could not well do less than awaken in a child's mind as it fell asleep, visions of inconceivable horrors, comforting and strength-renewing (?) for the little form to grow beauteous upon while unconscious, Spiritualism teaches that when the weary one is ready to close mortal eyes in the last sleep, he is gently laid upon the couch as a loving mother places her sleeping infant to rest, the released soul awaking in a happy land of lovelinesso more entrancing than any dream could be. Have we any knowledge that this is true? Do we know aught of our beloved faith? Let us consider.

Without speaking one word against any religious movement which might, to many prove a stepping stone toward more exalted spheres, I am yet led quite often to compare the prevalent condition of what is meant for religious thought among the masses, to the spectacle of the man of whom I read not long since, being so moved with astonishment at his own wisdom, that he involuntarily raised his hat to his own shadow whenever he chanced to see it. Many latter day worshipers of creeds and dogmas stand so much in awe of their own professions as to fail utterly in perceiving that anything awe-inspiring may possibly exist outside of themselves. I formed the acquaintance of a woman a few years ago, who posed as wiser than the average, and a leader of ethics generally in her somewhat limited sphere of action. Converse, somehow, turned upon the question of politics; and taking my part in its march, led me to state my adherence to Democratic principles. She was amazed, and swift to say so. I proceeded to inquire why she was a Republican? What constituted the difference between the two parties? What principles they first sprang from, etc? A very brief examination of this order disclosed her utter ignorance of all political science, and the only reason she was able to offer for having a political bias at all, was because her father had been a Republican. Later, the unfortunate subject of Equal Suffrage was introduced. Turning to me she said: "I suppose you belong to this uprising also." I pleaded guilty; and whereas she had been amazed before, she was now horrified. I strove to defend my unwomanly (?) position through the old "survival-of-the-fittest" argument; that, in as much as when God commenced creating animals, He made the lower orders first, proceeding to higher and higher types until, in the evolvement of woman, He consummated the last grand act of creative power, hence it seemed to me she was qualified to assume some of life's most important responsibilities. With a look of blank surprise she said: "Why, I didn't know God made the lower animals first." I gave it up, and retired, defeated by ignorance.

Within the last few days, however, a good Presbyterian friend undertook to prove that, being a Spiritualist, I was outside the fold. I commenced asking him questions, also, only to discover that he did not know how many articles of faith or how many sacraments his church owned; did not know its origin, or history, why its name, nor, indeed, was he in the least equipped with any of the knowledge St. Paul must have meant when he admonished his followers to be able to give a reason for the faith they proclaimed; and I was constrained to agree with the prophet Hosea when he said: "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge."

Our subject, Spiritualism, Its Source, Course and Goal, is sufficient to fill the world's vast libraries, and engage the listening ears of men for ages yet unborn; so we will glance only at the bright hilltops in our brief space this evening.

Backward through the gloom of antiquity as far as we can go, the most scholarly research of this latter age leads to the conclusion that the present stage of evolvement, the progress to human creation, developed somewhere upon or about the great Bactrian table land, or what our late geographies name, the Plateau of Iran; lying east of the great river Euphrates, and known to have been the early home of the Aryan race. Just when this mighty event transpired, we know not; but during the latter half of the present century, such men as Sir Henry Rawlinson, Sir William Jones and Henry Colebrooke, have furnished the world with a knowledge of the Sanscrit language; which was the living language of India—the country to which this same research also proves these Aryan peoples migrated 2,000 to 1,500 years B. C. These chronicles having lain sealed up within this ancient, and so many years to us, dead language, it was as effectually concealed from modern civilization as though buried thousands of leagues under the sea.

I now make the sweeping assertion—accept or reject it as you like, but study it before doing either—that every great religion which has aided in molding the world's destinies, has, before being prostituted to man's selfish purposes, been pure Spiritualism. The earliest records known of any earth-religion, tell us of Brahmanism; and of this, no personal founder was ever known. The word simply meant to its devotees what we mean when we speak the name of God. Our Christian Bible tells us that God is spirit; so God-ism or Brahman-ism would each mean Spiritism, or, as we have it, Spiritualism; and the same word comprehends all that can be known of spiritual religion, call it by what name you choose.

About 500 years B. C., when the practice of Brahmanism had grown corrupt, Buddhism rose in India, and its founder was Prince Gautama. He was called "The Buddha," in Sanscrit, signifying "Enlightened;" as "The Christ" in Hebrew signifies "Anointed." The importance of these truths forbids apology for reiterating them when we urge that they be studied before being rejected; and especially the spirituality of the teachings of Gautama, the Buddha. Spiritualism is the essence and real spirit of Judaism, as any Bible student must own who reads understandingly; for it is filled from beginning to end with spirit communion, and direct speech with God. The teachings of Jesus of Nazareth, and practiced by his disciples as recorded in the New Testament Scriptures, is also pure Spiritualism, as any unbiased and honest student must admit; indeed, we cannot find a religious movement anywhere in the world's history, which has wielded an uplifting influence upon mankind, that has not been in its essence, Spiritualism.

Now let us carefully notice a very significant fact. History teaches that from 1,500 to 500 years B. C., Persia had extended her borders until she reigned mistress of the then known world; but that on the fateful day of Arbela 337 B. C., her supremacy went down before Grecian valor, and Alexander became master of western Asia; carrying the fruits of his victories, as is customary, to his native land. Now, observe. Through the services rendered the world by these eminent Sanscrit scholars above named, we are enabled to compare the striking coincidences between Greek philosophy and that of ancient India, Grecian literature itself reveals the truth that Thales, Anaxagoras, Democritus, and numerous other of her greatest men living from 600 to 400 B. C., took long journeys into far Oriental countries for the purposes of study, even as we send our youth to Europe now for better educational advantages. This proof that Greece drew her principles of enlightened civilization from far Eastern nations whose course and years had endowed them with wisdom, is indisputable; as those who are sufficiently unprejudiced can easily convince themselves if they choose.

We have now reached the point where we must recognize the deathless truth that Grecian civilization is world-wide to-day. Read Greek classics, and dare deny this statement. If, then, through the rise and fall of Roman greatness which followed the decline of Greece, and which in turn bequeathed its rich heritage from former civilizations to the all conquering Anglo-Saxon, of what antique nationalities are we the heirs? The answer is simple. No people inherits from those who are to come, but from those who have passed on; hence the home of Spiritualism, all occult or esoteric wisdom, all anointing and enlightening, must logically be that mighty land of which we, dwellers in this western land, know almost nothing; Mighty India.

Knowing nothing of her greatness, we see ourselves so in her stead; hence are moved to uncover our heads to ourselves, deeming ourselves the only true religionists, because, forsooth, we are the only ones of whom we have knowledge, or before whom we can bow.

Thus much for the Source considering our time. Let us notice a little something of the Course of Spiritualism, and how it touches ourselves. Please bear in mind, I do not speak of mere abstract truth when I attempt to enumerate a few of its crowning blessings in waiting for the faithful, believing one who lives its truths. To such an one, it is an applied science; a living, glowing, refreshing life; transforming all the being into a divine, rhythmic harmony. Neither a thorough knowledge of music, nor the possession of a perfect instrument, or both will yield sweet sounds for the entertainment of the senses; but both must become active, or no music would ever be evolved.

An effect is never manifested except a cause lies back of it. All we can see of know of what we term good and evil, has its cause, and that cause is spirit power, either well or ill directed. When we see health and strength glowing, abounding, conquering, we know that spirit power in such person is present in harmonious activity. When knowledge and wisdom crown a life with works that are fruitful of good to all associated with it, we know that spiritual wealth is being shed into that life; and when universal love glorifies and illuminates and transfigures the whole personality, we may know the spirit of God dwells within. And such an one is a great spiritual medium; always; always has been and always will be distinguished by just such characteristics.

Here we touch upon a phase of Modern Spiritualism which, more than any other, perhaps, demands clear interpretation. A medium, speaking the term in its broadest sense, is always that objective substance or thing, through which motion, action or communication must take place; and we must remember that this object or substance can quite as easily communicate the false as the true; the right as the wrong; results depending upon causes directed by the human will. All the nearer spheres of invisible life are inhabited in about the same proportion with good and evil, or with highly evolved and undeveloped entities, as this plane upon which we live. No special argument is needed to prove this, for they are, when arriving on the other shores, just as they left here; and the proportion of those who aspire toward holy and divine things cannot well be greater there than here, while we might almost be justified in regarding it as less; for those who are fitted for higher spheres, would naturally advance to them at once, and thus be farther removed from us. These would find it less easy, and perhaps less desirable, except impelled by an interest in loved ones still here, to return to this level at all. Thus we perceive that our chances for being advised by wise spirits is less, possibly, than the same chances for gaining advice we can rely upon from those with whom we associate daily in the body; and most of us know how to place a proper estimate on that.

Spirit is ever striving to express itself through matter; and all forms of matter are spirit expressions; hence, mediums of spirit. And when conscious spirit forms from the invisible, seek to express themselves, their thoughts or wishes through the medium of human bodies such as they formerly inhabited, they seek first, such as are possible for their purpose, and secondly, such as are most congenial to their own characters. This point cannot be too carefully nor clearly stated. Nor can it be too carefully considered by those who seek communications from loved ones gone before, or advice as to their own progress. Pure water can be passed into an impure channel; but it can scarcely be expected to come forth pure. Mediums for spirit communication, abound everywhere; but it does not follow that they all receive communications from spirits endowed with such wisdom as may be trusted or accepted for the guidance of an immortal soul in its progress up spiritual heights. Like attracts like; and the false and impure, or undeveloped spirit, who would neither be able nor desire to exert any great influence for the uplifting of others, will ever seek to communicate through a similar human personality. The mere fact that a man's or woman's life is vile, false or deceptive does not prevent either the possession or exercise of mediumistic, or soul powers; but we must assert and emphasize the assertion, that it does determine the quality of the communications secured. Spiritual phenomena, such as inspirational speaking and writing, clairaudience and clairvoyance, artistic, musical, materializing and all such forms of spirit manifestation, are the legitimate and most logical fruits of Spiritualism. Did an apple tree fail to bear apples, we could never be sure it was an apple tree at all. Indeed, in the highest sense, it would not be one; but only a tree; since all that could make it an apple tree would be its fruit. Equally as well, however might we expect apples to grow without a tree as to expect phenomena independently of the principle of Spiritualism. In other words, spiritual phenomena must follow the application, or exercise of spiritual philosophy; and will do so, as surely as day follows night; but—the weight of this statement is its apology for repetition—the value of the phenomena depends more largely upon the purity of the medium than we are accustomed to think. How many careless and even mischievous characters have you met during your lifetime, who, were you to go asking advice, would concoct any kind of high sounding tale, tell you with sublime assurance that your welfare depended upon following their directions, and with you well out of sight, turn and laugh at your credulity; and do you think there are none in the invisible realms whose delight lies in the same occupation? These seek their own kind for communications.

Pure, white light cannot shed its rays through green glass except their hue is changed; nor through black glass at all. Our cause of Spiritualism, as it stands before the world for judgment, rests almost solely upon its mediums. By this, I mean all who are engaged in disseminating its truths either as teachers or phenomenal workers; for both are essential, even as the tree and its fruits. Could all our mediums be led to the high levels of purity, purity in thought and speech and life, we should speedily see our efforts to prove Spiritualism the one universal religion, triumphant; should see angel wings lowering over all the earth and perfection crowning all living things; aye the millennial awaits only this. Don't understand me to be condemning our mediums as a body, however; for I truly believe that proportionately, we have in our ranks to-day, a lesser number of impure people than the orthodox churches have. But I am speaking for edification among ourselves; our duty consisting more at present and as an association, in delivering ourselves, than our neighbors from bonds.

As we ascend the pathways leading to higher and still higher planes, we see farther and still farther out over life's varying expanse, and are enabled to discern with clearer and yet clearer vision, the causes of burdens under which humanity gropes blindly forward. From these heights we perceive that self, and not universal truth and righteousness is the mainspring in, alas, too many lives! The vast majority are seeking their own personal well-being instead of obeying the heavenly injunction, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." All these differing views are to be considered in the Course of Spiritualism, and many more might, did time permit; but we will glance briefly at its Goal.

And what is the Goal of Spiritualism? We all, daily, speak words which, if called suddenly to define, should find ourselves totally at a loss for any kind of definition. Is it eternal progress? That would scarcely be a goal; since a goal is an ultimate, and must forever lie ahead as we move onward. Is it eternal life? This, too, is endless. We might profitably consider many desirable points toward which to attain; but suppose we regard Universal Love as our Goal. Let us notice that we cannot even contemplate this subject without getting outside of self. Its very boundlessness compels our outreaching thoughts. Self-love and universal love are antipodal as light and darkness; and I repeat, cannot even be thought of in the same direction. Universal love is creative because it is selfless. It unites and does not dissolve. Let universal love reign among the people of the earth, and the resurrection day will dawn. A deathless glory will crown with immortality every living soul; and there will be no more death. This is Spiritualism; for spirit is deathless. Listen:

"Long centuries ago, in a famed city
Across the sea, a great cathedral stood;
A witness to the beauty Art had wrested
From marble, bronze and wood.

"One day the sunlight, through a slanted window,
Upon a shadowed arch a moment shone;
Revealing unto those whose eyes were lifted,
What none before had known.

"It was a sculptured face of such transcendent
And utter loveliness, that those who saw
Deemed they had looked upon a heavenly vision;
And held their breath for awe.

"And day by day, for many years thereafter,
Men came from far and near; happy to sit
And wait beneath the arch for the brief sun-ray
That should illumine it,

"And felt them well repaid for all their waiting
If they could catch, just for a moment's space,
Whereon to speak; to dream; to live; one single,
Swift glimpse, of that fair face.

"This is the story. When the great cathedral
Was being built, there, came, one day, with meek respect,
A man, aged and feeble, unto
The master architect,

"And asked, that of the work so sweet and sacred,
Some humblest portion might be granted him.
His feebleness and age compassionating,
Yet fearing that his dim,

"Uncertain sight, and trembling, eager fingers,
Might mar some fair design, some perfect view,
In the high roof's vaulted shadows,
Set him his work to do.

"Day after day, with sweet, untiring patience,
In his obscure and humble place he wrought.
From his more highly trusted fellow-workers
Winning scant speech or thought.

"At last one morning, still and cold they found him;
His right hand's cunning gone. The mystic grace
Of death enfolding him. His face upturned
Unto that other face

"That he had wrought. The face of the one woman—
For so they learned—that he had loved and lost
In early manhood's prime, ere care and sorrow
His happy path had crossed.

"And as they gazed, the artists and the sculptors
And the craftsmen, all, whose skill was making fair
And grand the vast cathedral, on the beauty
So strangely carven there.

"'Grandest of all!' they cried; and then they whispered,
'Who works for fame or gold doth something miss;
Unheeding praise or blame; in shadowed silence,
Love hath wrought—this.'

"'Grandest of all!' they cried; 'before whose perfect
Ideal loveliness, all our boastings cease.
Hail! to the love that thus, for love's sake only Hath wrought art's masterpiece.'

"So, in the temple of the ages, builded
Out of men's lives, it comes to every one
Some day, to learn, there is no work so noble
As that which love has done."

So the principle which must finally deliver us from death, the principle which is immortality, is Universal Love; and this we find to have been the basis of all religions that ever strove to enlighten mankind; the earliest as well as the latest; and Spiritualism stands to-day, the representative of every denominational movement, embracing within her mighty name all that can be told.

THE OPTIMIST.

The fields were bleak and sodden. Not a wing
Or note enlivened the depressing wood;
A soiled and sullen, stubborn snowdrift stood
Beside the roadway. Winds came muttering
Of storms to be, and brought the chilly sting
Of icebergs in their breath. Stalled cattle mooed
Forth plaintive pleadings for the earth's green food;
No gleam; no hint of hope in anything.

The sky was blank and ashen, like the face
Of some poor wretch who drains life's cup too fast.
Yet, swaying to and fro, as if to fling
About chilled Nature its lithe arms of grace,
Smiling with promise in the wintry blast,
The optimistic Willow spoke of Spring.

A QUERY.

Is Spiritualism a Science or a Religion?

For the first time in my long life I am puzzled to know "where I am at."

It is nearly half a century since I witnessed my first test of that which a few days later was spoken audibly to me and called, "Spiritualism," which I then and there embraced for all the years of my life, or I may say, my existence.

I soon became very clairvoyant, clairaudient, and other good gifts were unlimited. Is it any wonder that I was enabled to see the very "soul of things."

Indeed, I was an enthusiast, and longed for "a thousand tongues to sing my great redeemer's praise"—(only I was so exalted in myself I did not feel the need of any such a helper, and was free to say so). Yet through it all I saw the wisdom of a creator, of Infinite Intelligence, whom I call God.

I one day called on an aged lady who lay on her death-bed. Her husband was also aged and blind, and they were poor in worldly goods, though "rich in faith toward God."

The aged man spoke very kindly, calling me back to my early teachings of the Gospel, when I, knowing about as much as most others in a like condition, answered rather pertly that "I believed I knew enough of that," at which the man drew in his breath quick and hard, saying, "Oh!" which seemed more like a groan.

It was the most effective sermon I ever heard, and I laid it well to heart. I had sense enough to feel that I was trampling on the only light he had to render life endurable.

From that day I began to "study the Scriptures," with the aid of superior help. I soon found that the prophecies therein were being fulfilled to the letter by the coming of this "phenomena" in the "clouds of heaven," and the holy angels with it, and Christ is the Philosophy of it all. But on what wings did he come? Here I was obliged to surrender my childish fancies of wings, and accept a more rational method of locomotion by electricity, and since the opening of this new age what has not been accomplished for the good of man by this agent? I believe in science as Mother, but I believe in God as "Our Father." "Without him was not anything made that was made," whose name is Love, Will, or Wisdom, all combined in Spirit.

I have worked for nearly half a century upon this plane. I have tested it in life and death, for truly I gave my life for another who was pronounced dead. I brought her back, though in doing so I pledged my own life, which was required of me, yet given back at what appeared to others to be the last of earth for me.

I have cast out devils—but this deserves a chapter of itself. I have drank poisonous things, but they irritate only for a season, when I, become more positive than before.

Healing the sick was my work for years. I never lost a case. The angels were with me, I had nothing to fear. No, though I have been many times obliged to deal with serpents, I have nothing to fear. "Spiritualism" is my Religion, then as now, and I trust forever.

* * * * * *

Now let me say a few words on your all important question, "Science," etc. I do not wish to be ignorant upon anything of so great interest to mankind. Hence in the beginning of my studies I made myself acquainted with the science of phrenology—which I esteem of the utmost importance to every one to know himself, if he would deal justly with humanity. Let him find out if he is able to decide this all-important question, when the organ of veneration, on a scale of seven, marks only five, or may be less, with Spirituality scarcely more, while the equally important organ of Benevolence goes begging altogether, can he make it up by Self Esteem, or Language, a galore? As well say he can measure the Infinite, entire, in a pint cup. Certainly he works injury to the cause we love so well. I beg of you not to dishonor Science in the very beginning of your Herculean task.

TRUSTING.

When winds and waves are raging
Through every threadbare sail,
When my bark seems all unlikely
To stem the awful gale,
I drop my oars, am quiet,
And say: Let come what will,
All safe in the arms infinite
I know I'll be resting still.

E'en though my boat is stranded,
And the wild waves dash me o'er,
I yet shall make my moorings
Upon some fairer shore.
Or if the worlds should crumble
And back to chaos fall,
Serene, unhurt, undaunted,
I would triumph over all.

No matter where I wander,
On desert-land or sea,
Or out and on for ages
In the blue immensity,
I shall not be lost or injured,
For the Father's hand shall guide,
And within the love unfailing
I must evermore abide.

For since I'm "part and parcel"
Of the great eternal whole,
I'd as soon think God could perish
As that I could lose my soul;
Or that height or depth or distance
Aye, any powers that be
Could intercept the current
That bears my own to me.

The hand that guides the wild-bird
Through trackless seas of air,
To fields in sunny South-lands,
With matchless love and care,
I know will lead my footsteps
In paths that are the best—
The only royal highway
To regions of the blest.

LAURA B. PAYNE

LIFE AND EXPERIENCE IN SPIRIT LAND

A Series of Letters From Prof. William Denton, Through the Mediumship of Carlyle Petersilea.

LETTER NUMBER FOUR

My Dear Professor, Carlyle Petersilea: Sir:—I have long desired to say something to the world at large on the very important subject of intromission, and I now find my opportunity. Of course all persons who have reached the years of discretion well understand the meaning of the word, but as an invisible being I wish to write of the intromission of the invisible within the visible.

Many scientists, together with agnostics, appear to entirely overlook the great law of intromission. They do not overlook it so far as the well known is concerned, for they are well aware that electricity, together with various gases, can completely infill a human body. They are now beginning to understand that all material things, whatsoever, are infilled by ether, or the ethereal atmosphere; in other words, that ether exists throughout all space continually, unbroken and undisturbed; that the earth, a house, or a material form of any kind exists within it without displacing or disturbing a particle of it. It infills and passes through all bodies as though they did not exist. To the ether all material forms are like shadows without substance, and to the material forms the ether is intangible, without form or substance.

Now I think I have stated these scientific facts clearly, and I don't know that any person of ordinary intelligence will disagree with me.

The human form, then, exists within this ether without knowing it is filled by it; and the ether is not cognizant of the human, or material body, rather. Now when scientists and agnostics admit the great truth of the unbounding and unbounded ether they are getting directly into the spiritual world without knowing it and they are admitting the immortality of the soul, as I hope to show further on, and by and through this ether hope to prove to all men as well, the immortality of the soul, and that there is a spirit and soul. I hope also to prove that nothing could exist without the ether, that it is the primal cause of all existing things whatsoever, and if we must have a God we might just as well call that God, Ether, for you are wont to say that God is within and about all things, that he it is who moves on the face of the deep and life springs forth. Life in and of itself does not originate within the deep or within matter; its origin is within ether, Life permeates all living things as does ether, the difference being that one is conscious of life and not conscious of the ether. Life is an element, or principle, just as is ether; but life is not continuous and unbroken as is ether but is broken up into or by form, and these forms exist within the unbroken ether.

"How, then," you ask me, "is ether the cause of life?"

Before I answer this question I wish to state that ether is possessed of many qualities. First, it is luminiferous, that is it holds, by the great law of intromission, an exceedingly fine, bright, ethereal light, that, like it and together with it, permeates all things whatsoever. The material light of the sun, and other celestial bodies has nothing to do with this light.

"And God said, Let there be light; and there was light." This was before the sun, moon, earth or stars were created, or at least before they existed. If we change the word God back to its original meaning, we have the word Om, or Am, or I Am, which really means the invisible life or breath which infills and surrounds all things. You now call it Ether instead of Om, that is, Ether is the English word for the Oriental Om. "And Om said, Let there be light; and there was light." Now you, to-day, call Om and his light, luminiferous ether. The Orientals really meant the same thing, and if their meaning had not been twisted and garbled it would be: "And within Om, there resided, or dwelt, Light." To you now it means, Within the boundless and unbounded ether, forever resides unbounded and boundless Light. God is Light. Om is Light. But Ether, together with its Light, is not visible to material sight, and this light and this ether are eternal, having had no beginning and consequently can have no end. They are co-existent and eternal. The eternal God. The eternal Om. The eternal Ether. All, really, mean the same.

Now light intromits, permeates, and infills ether, held within it in loving embrace. Two primal elements, male and female, positive and negative. Ether positive, its light negative.

Within this luminiferous ether there must, necessarily, reside the primal elements of all that was, is, or ever shall be. All must see, at once, that this must be so, necessarily. It could not possibly be otherwise; and in this sense nothing ever was created, and there never was a beginning, consequently there can be no end, simply involution, evolution, and development of that which ever was or ever shall be.

We think we have shown, conclusively that all things exist primarily within the luminiferous ether, even light itself. Now we come to that much mooted question, Infinite Intelligence; and here let us most solemnly affirm that Infinite Intelligence forever infills and thoroughly permeates the luminiferous ether.

Now we have Ether, Light, and Infinite Intelligence; all three co-existent and eternal. Just here is where the idea of a three-fold God originated. Not God as a personality, but the three primal elements that constitute the creative energy.

If intelligence were not infinite, without beginning and without end, no intelligence could be manifested throughout nature. This is clear and plain to all spiritual beings who are infilled with enough of it, but it takes a considerable amount of intelligence to fully comprehend it. One may say that intelligence is evoluted from matter; but, unless matter possessed it, it could not be evoluted from it; that is self-evident; but intelligence does not belong to matter except as it may infill matter. That intelligence is manifested through matter is also true, but it is no part of matter itself. Ether is not matter. intelligence is not matter, light is not matter, that is, not in their primal condition.

Now we come to matter, spirit and soul in their primal or first condition. These three are as eternal as ether itself and co-existent with it, never had a beginning, can never have an end. Now the ether is infilled with light, intelligence, matter, spirit and soul, and soul is life. The word soul should really be rendered life: The soul, which is the life thereof, or the life which is the soul thereof. Now all these things exist in their first, or primal state, together and with ether, submerged within luminiferous ether, which like a boundless ocean, engulfs them. "And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the deep." The spirit, or Om, moves within the abyssmal depths of the ether; that is, and was, the original meaning of the text; and the meaning is clear. Spirit is not immovable as is ether but moves within it, otherwise it is in constant motion, never still, no, not for an instant, and its movement is rotatory; in other words it is agitated by infinite intelligence, agitated, moved, or shaken, which causes it to coalesce, or cover itself with matter, hiding within matter, and together they form the infinite, eternal, never-ending ocean of atoms. Thus a marriage, or union, takes place between spirit and matter, and thus they are forever forming endless material suns, and these, in their turn, being in constant rotatory motion like the atoms of which they are composed, at length cast off their children, the planets, or earths; and here I will not go into details for the medium tells me that they have already been given a great many times by other spirits who have written through this channel; but atoms, although they are composed of spirit and matter, do not contain life or soul, nor intelligence; these, thus far, have not been made use of; they still reside within the ether; but soul and intelligence coalesce, or a union, or marriage, takes place between them and form is the result—living, intelligent form—for soul is life and intelligence hides itself therein and this forms the infinitesimal life germ. The invisible, infinitesimal atoms of spirit matter at length form worlds, visible worlds, but spirit is really the magnetic or attractive principle, and when a world becomes fitted for them, the life germs are attracted and held within spirit and matter. Now, just at this point the great law of evolution commences to operate together with the eternal law of involution. Spirit and matter involve soul and intelligence and then evolve them in a more perfect and developed condition.

We are well aware that scientific, so-called, men do not accept these great truths, but commence with matter as a cell, a minute cell; but if they were here in the spirit world as we are, they would at once see that the so-called cell was simply a point of spirit, or magnetic flame, covered with translucent matter which, of course, gives it the appearance of a cell, in other words a tiny hollow globe or oval; but these cells are infilled by spirit through the great law of intromission; so that which appears to be matter is really spirit and matter in equal proportions, one hiding or covering the other; but, be it ever borne in mind that spirit is the great attractive or magnetic force; otherwise matter could not be held together in any kind of form. All things in nature are composed of spirit and matter, but this is not all; spirit and matter are infilled by soul-life and intelligence; these are attracted by spirit, and thus are involved into matter and spirit; and when scientific men take up these threads they will be on the right road and arrive safely at their destination which should be immortality.

Some at this point may ask: "Mr. Denton, how about form in all its various manifestations?" and my reply is this:

Infinite Intelligence has no form; it infills the luminiferous ether; but when it coalesces with soul, or life, which also in its first or primal state infills the ether, form is produced, or the infinitesimal, invisible life germs—soul germs—from the lowest to the highest, from the smallest speck of intelligence to that of man, but involution precedes evolution, always.

O, how can the world overlook this great fact? Strange—passing strange, when it is going on before the eyes of all persons at all times. A chicken must be involved before it can be evolved. A human being must be involved before that being can be evolved. Not a seed can be formed until it has involved the germinal principle, or the life or soul-germ.

It is now being stated that matter is not dead. Spirits wrote that fact through this medium twenty or more years ago. It was then shown that the heart of each atom was spirit, but spirit is not intelligent. Spirit is not soul, but it is the fine, magnetic clothing of intelligent soul; and matter proper, which is really inert without spirit, is the coarser material covering of both spirit and soul which infills it. It is just as impossible to evolve that which had no previous existence as it would be to create something out of nothing; in fact it would really be creating something out of nothing. To evolve intelligence, that did not previously exist, out of matter which did not possess it, would be something like an old lady spinning thread without either flax, wool, cotton, or any other material. The old lady can spin the thread but she must have the substance from which to spin it; or, like a weaver, weaving a web without either warp or filling. One would think him insane if he were to say that by constantly keeping his loom going he could weave all kinds of beautiful cloths in various patterns—nothing was required but the loom and its motion. The loom may stand for matter and its motion for force per se.

The scientists will tell you that through the great law of evolution nothing is required but force and matter. It seems so ridiculous to me now, force and matter evolving millions of complicated forms of various patterns, and at the same time evolving intelligence of the highest order—God-like intelligence. If the scientist believes in a future existence at all, he thinks that matter also evolves spirit and soul. He doesn't put a thing into his loom of matter except motion, or force, and he takes out web after web of the most beautiful and serviceable stuffs, at least, he imagines he does.

Then there are others who think intelligent spirit and soul do not exist at all until through evolution the human stage is reached, that man alone possesses an immortal spirit, as they often call the immortal ego or soul, and that this has been gradually evolved from matter.

Now this is something like a woman putting the pot on to boil; she puts nothing into it but water, yet she insists that if the pot boils long enough she can take out the finest and best of dinners, all evolved from the boiling water and the material pot. But I tell you, my friends, if a good dinner is taken from that pot it must first be put into it. Nothing can be evolved from that pot except that which it holds. If man has been evolved up from a hollow cell of matter, pure and simple, until he stands an intelligent, immortal spirit, soul, ego, and nothing below him has a spirit, or soul, or intelligence, where in God's name did he get them? Perhaps by rubbing Aladdin's lamp; then if he goes floating off into space with nothing immortal below him, and nothing beyond him but progressed man—by what and through what does he progress and where, at last, is his landing place? How is it possible that countless millions upon millions, billions and trillions, sextillions, and as many tillions as one can think, of God-like intelligent angels, exist in the celestial worlds, all having their origin within a cell of protoplasm that never yet possessed a spark of intelligence? O, but you say that evolution did it all. The idea is too preposterous for even a child to think about. Evolution means to unroll or unfold something that already exists.

Well, do these things all exist within a cell of matter?

No, no, no! A thousand times no! Nothing can be evoluted which is not first involuted. One cannot unroll that which does not exist.

Now I am going to make a startling assertion, that is, it will be startling to most people. Things do not come up from the lower to the higher, but they descend from the higher to the lower. Now do not throw this down and say you will not read any further, for I am going to prove what I say; so have a little patience and read on.

You will all admit that soul, or life, is higher than matter, that intelligence is also higher than matter, that spirit is also higher than matter. Does a man's material body produce his soul, his spirit, his intelligence, or does his intelligent soul clothe itself with spirit and matter, in other words, descend into and infill it? Why the very fact of his stepping out of it, and leaving it dead and inert, is evidence in itself. If his intelligent soul, or life, descended into matter and took it on as clothing, am I not right when I say that it is from the higher to the lower, and not from the lower to the higher? The soul, or life principle, being united with intelligence, is higher than spirit and matter, and must first exist and become active before they can take on spirit and matter. How is it possible to deny this? Then soul life and intelligence must first be involuted before it can evolute, or unroll, or develop, and every living thing that exists must first be involuted before it can evolute, or develop, or unroll; it must first be there to unroll or it can't unroll; and this is true of every blade of grass, of every flower, of every shrub, of every tree, of every insect, bird and animal.

Now you ask me: How, does involution take place? and I will answer.

Matter and spirit form into atoms. Life and Intelligence form into soul germs, or atoms, minute germs, invisible to most people, or supposed to be; these are inhaled by all breathing creatures, and attracted by the spirit within all inanimate living things which do not breathe; the flowers of plant or tree acting as lungs, holding the germ and thus producing seed. In other words the little germ clothes itself with spirit and matter until a favorable opportunity presents to unroll itself, or evolute. And thus it is with man. Intelligent soul germs take on spirit and matter as clothing and then evolute or develop.

Ever yours,

WILLIAM DENTON.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

MACCLESFIELD PEARLS.

Every day is a little life, and our whole life is but a day repeated. Those, therefore, that dare lose a day are dangerously prodigal; those that dare mis-spend, desperate.

Life is not a little cup dipped from the stream at a time: it is itself a stream, and though at its birth it may dance and send forth cheerful murmurs as it does not afterwards, still it is intended to flow as it advances through more beautiful regions, and to adorn its shores with richer verdure and more abundant harvests.

All cannot play a hero's part,
And win a name in hard fought fight.
But all can have a loving heart,
Fear God, and strive to do the right.

A double blessing is a double grace.

When doing what is right the heart is easy, and becomes better every day; but when practicing deceit the mind labors, and every day gets worse.

People will wait for the time, but the time won't wait for them.

Let our lives be as pure as the snowfields, where our footsteps leave a mark, but not a stain.

Let your light shine in your home, and don't be afraid that it will become too bright. Don't be turning it down all the time, as some people do their gas.

Give us to see
The hidden good in work and care,
The growing grace that comes from Thee
In heavy woes and heart-wrenched tears,
Adown great griefs and bitter pain,
As flowers spring to greet the sky
Along the echoes of the rain.

ARE SPIRITUALISTS MEAN?

You touch upon a very important point in your leading article of last week. Whatever the cause, it is to be deplored that the offerings are so small at Spiritualist meetings. But what shall we say regarding those Spiritualists who absent themselves entirely from such meetings, and who give nothing whatever to the cause? There must be thousands of these, many of them well off in this world's goods, and well able to give a silver coin, and maybe a gold one.

There are many people who have attended Spiritualist meetings until they received conviction of spirit return and spirit communion, who afterwards seldom or never visit such places, but who go to orthodox places of worship, and give liberally to support them, either because it is considered more fashionable or respectable to do so. Are such people ashamed to be seen going to a Spiritualist place of worship because it is situated in a poor locality, up a court, or in an upper room?

It is very important that offertories should be large, for "money makes the mare go." If individual offerings are not large, let us endeavor to get more people to attend the meetings by advertising such events in the local papers each time, distributing pamphlets, and writing letters to the press in support of the cause; in fact, advertising Spiritualism in all ways. If more money can be got, good speakers can be engaged, larger halls or churches rented or built, and Spiritualism will take its place amongst the religions of the land, to flourish and increase for all time.

THE HEARSE.

Lord Dufferin used to tell a creepy story. Nearly twenty years ago he was staying in a country house in Ireland. While dressing for dinner he heard wheels on the gravel, and, looking through the window he saw a hearse drive up to the front door. He was impressed with the face of the driver—a puffed, heavy, unwholesome face. Assuming that a servant had died in the house he mentioned the matter to his host, but was told there had been no death, and that the appearance of the hearse was supposed to be a warning to the person who saw it. A little later he went to Paris, and stayed at the Grand Hotel. Entering the lift he observed with a shock of alarm that the attendant had the face of the man on the hearse. He got out and walked downstairs. Immediately afterwards the lift smashed, and all the occupants were killed.
